Within a few days after the verdict had been returned in Cleveland, I called upon the Attorney General and personally asked of him a further explanation concerning the dismissal of the Crobaugh case and particularly concerning the new evidence which was alleged to have been brought to the Department of Justice by Mr. Garfield and others but which was not presented in court by Crobaugh's attorneys at his trial. In the course of that interview I specifically requested the Attorney General to ascertain, if he did not know, what persons other than Mr. Garfield had used any influence or made any representations to the department in Crobaugh's behalf, and I requested him to ascertain the nature of that other influence, if there was any. I called his attention to an editorial in a Cleveland newspaper criticizing the action of the department and directly charging that the official statements made by the department last March concerning the new evidence said to have been presented had never been substantiated and that, in fact, no such new evidence ever existed. And I left a copy of that editorial with the Attorney General, requesting an explanation of that charge.

Under date of January 8, 1932, I received a letter from the Attorney General, which was remarkable for what it omitted rather than for what it contained. It explained that Mr. Dodds had concluded that it was improbable that the trial of Crobaugh alone would result in a conviction, as it would not be likely to impress the jury as being an impartial effort on the part of the Government to fix the responsibility for the alleged fraud.

The letter further stated that the Attorney General concurred in that view of his assistant, and went on to add that the case did not belong in the Federal courts in the first place, and that if the Attorney General had known the facts he would have taken that position before any Federal indictment was obtained. I will not pause to discuss the merit of the Attorney General's view that the fraud was primarily an offense against the laws of the State of Ohio and consequently the Department of Justice was relieved of all responsibility in the case, the use of the mails being a mere incident of the scheme, because I have already indicated the contrary view of the county prosecutor who secured the conviction, and because it is obvious that if such were really the policy of the Department of Justice there would have been no occasion for the expensive investigation which is alleged to have cost the department some $20,000.

I note particularly that the Attorney General's letter addressed to me on January 8 did not say that any new evidence was brought into the department to justify the nolle which was ordered last March. The letter does not explain the statement made by Assistant Attorney General Dodds last March that much documentary evidence, to which the department had not had access before, was submitted at that time, and that such evidence justified the dismissal of the case. The letter does not even refer to the charge that there never was any such new evidence, though I had specifically asked an explanation concerning that statement. The letter makes no answer to the question as to who else beside Mr. Garfield interceded with the department.

Attached to the Attorney General's letter, to which I have just referred, was another letter bearing the same date and suggesting that inasmuch as judgment had not yet been pronounced in the criminal case against Crobaugh in Cleveland, the letter of January 8 be regarded as entirely confidential until the case might be concluded. This suggestion I have observed; but since judgment has now been pronounced in the State case, there appears no impropriety in proposing the inquiry which I am suggesting.

The fact that the Department of Justice asked the indictment of only one officer out of several, and later dismissed the indictment against that one on the ground that it would be unfair to try him alone, suggests the necessity for an investigation. The fact that a large sum of money was expended by the department upon the investigation of a violation of the postal laws is inconsistent with the Attorney General's justification of the dropping of the case on the ground that the primary offense was against the laws of the State of Ohio. The Attorney General's final explanation of the dismissal of this case is not in harmony with the official statements, which sought to justify the dismissal last March, the truthfulness of which is open to serious question. The influences which brought about the dismissal are unexplained, because the reasons finally given for the dismissal are reasons which appear to have been known to the department before the original indictment of Crobaugh was returned.

The action of the department in this case has caused much unfavorable comment in Cleveland and throughout northern Ohio. Confidence in the department has been diminished and will not be restored by the recent letter of the Attorney General to which I have alluded. Whether or not there may be a better explanation than any yet given, it seems abundantly clear that the public confidence which ought to be maintained in the Department of Justice can not be restored without a full and adequate investigation of the facts to which I have called attention.

I therefore submit a resolution asking for an inquiry by the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, or a subcommittee thereof, and I ask that the resolution be referred to that committee:

The resolution (S. Res. 176) was read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to make a full and complete investigation of the action or inaction of the Department of Justice in the case involving alleged use of the mails to defraud by the Union Mortgage Co., of Cleveland, Ohio, its officers and agents, and particularly with respect to the dismissal of the indictment against S. C. Crobaugh, president of said company, and the failure to obtain indictments against other officers and agents of said company. The committee shall report to the Senate as soon as practicable the results of its investigation, together with its recommendations.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places in the District of Columbia or elsewhere during the sessions and recesses of the Senate in the Seventy-second Congress until the final report is submitted, to employ such clerical and other assistants, to require by subpœna or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $1,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator from Ohio on the subject he has been discussing. I think I realize from what the Senator has said the importance of the investigation he has suggested. However, it will be no small matter, perhaps, to make the investigation. I presume there would have to be some preliminary investigation made by the Committee on the Judiciary before reporting his resolution with a recommendation either for or against a full investigation; in other words, there would have to be a recommendation from the Judiciary Committee as to whether or not the resolution should be adopted. I should like to say further to the Senator that, realizing, as I think I do, the importance of the question he has been discussing and the severity of the charge, the Judiciary Committee, of course, will have to give it, and ought to give it, very careful consideration.

The only suggestion I want to make to the Senator is that the work of the Judiciary Committee is very great; the committee is very much overworked; and I hope if this task is to be undertaken by the Judiciary Committee the Senator will not get impatient if there shall be some delay, in view of all the other work we have on hand.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I appreciate the necessity for a preliminary investigation. I have endeavored to make my statement on the floor very brief, but I am prepared to submit further data to the committee. I understand the committee will have to decide the relative importance of this matter as against other matters that are pending before it, but I hope that some early action may be taken on the resolution.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I did not hear, in full, the statement made by the Senator from Ohio. I was wondering if the State statutes do not cover the alleged transgressions referred to in the resolution and in the Senator's remarks.

Mr. BULKLEY. I stated that the defendant Crobaugh has been convicted under a State statute, but the indictment in the State court was not had until after the case had been nolled in the Federal court, and I question the propriety of that nolle.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I have read the resolution, and I think it carries an authorization of a thousand dollars with which to make the investigation.

Mr. BULKLEY. That is correct.

Mr. FESS. The resolution ultimately will have to go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. BULKLEY. I understand that; but it should go first to the Committee on the Judiciary for such preliminary examination as the Senator from Nebraska has suggested. Then, if approved there, it would have to go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution has been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

INDIANS IN DISTRESS—DESTRUCTION OF NAVAJO LIVESTOCK

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, yesterday the Committee on Indian Affairs of the House passed a resolution in regard to the condition of the Indians which I think sets out the present situation of the Indians and their condition in very plain and accurate language.

There have been a great many complaints from various reservations about the hardships of the Indians this winter. Out in the Southwest, especially, there have been great losses on account of the severe weather and the deep snow, affecting especially the flocks of the Navajos.

I ask unanimous consent to have this resolution read by the clerk and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolution concerning Indians in distress and the destruction of the Navajo livestock. Proposed by Representative PEAVEY, of Wisconsin, and unanimously adopted by the House Committee on Indian Affairs on March 2, 1932

Whereas due to crop failures, unemployment, recent blizzards, and the exhaustion of Indian tribal funds there now exists a state of acute and growing distress, amounting in thousands of cases to gradual starvation, among Indians in at least 10 States, and not fewer than 125,000 in number; and

Whereas the facts are known to the Interior Department and Bureau of Indian Affairs through numerous letters and telegrams from the superintendents, in the files of the Indian Office; and

Whereas it has been the policy of the administrative branch to withhold distress relief from those Indians administratively classed as nonwards, although the majority of such Indians are in fact still living in tribal relations, are still interested in tribal property, funds, or claims, or still subsisting under treaty relations with the Government; these Indians, thus denied Federal aid, numbering not fewer than 50,000; and

Whereas the American Red Cross is extending aid to these so-called nonward Indians in four States only (Montana, North and South Dakota, and Nebraska), and in the total amount of only $50,000 between this date and July 1, while the so-called nonward Indians in all other States, including Oklahoma, Wisconsin, Nevada, and California are denied aid alike by the Red Cross and by the Federal Government; and

Whereas for all the so-called ward Indians of the country the Bureau of Indian Affairs now has only $95,000 for distress relief for the balance of the fiscal year 1932, and is requesting only $135,000 in addition, or a total of $230,000 for not fewer than 75,000 so-called ward Indians in distress; and

Whereas the Indian tribes of the Southwest have already lost through starvation, following a series of blizzards, 200,000 or more of their sheep, and will lose during the month of March a greatly increased number unless feeding of the sheep can be provided at once, and the self-support of these tribes is dependent on their sheep; and

Whereas the Department of Agriculture has under its control funds which could be made available for the feeding of sheep and livestock belonging to Indians and for the rehabilitation of Indian farmers, but is not in a position to take the initiative and must wait on initiative from the Secretary of the Interior: Therefore be it

Resolved, First, that this committee declares its judgment that the denial of relief to the so-called nonward Indians in distress by the Federal Government is contrary to the body of statute laws affecting Indians, and contrary to the declarations of the Supreme Court as to Federal responsibility toward the Indians, and in addition does not properly follow from any ruling by the Comptroller General of the United States, and this committee strongly holds to the opinion that the United States is bound by legal as well as moral obligations to help these so-called nonward Indians numbering not fewer than 50,000. Such distress relief for so-called nonward Indians is provided in the bill H. R. 8498, pending before this committee, which bill proposes to make use of the local agencies of Government in the distribution of distress relief in line with the policy of the Secretary of the Interior as embodied in the pending bills H. R. 227 and S. 3110 now pending before this committee.

Second, that it is the judgment of this committee that a total fund of $230,000 for all so-called ward Indians in distress in the whole country from this date to the end of the fiscal year is a totally inadequate sum, being less than $5 for each Indian in distress.

Third, that it is the judgment of this committee that steps should be taken immediatey to make available to the Navajo, Apache, and Zuni Indians, and to any other Indians similarly situated, the funds under the control of the Department of Agriculture available for stock feed, and that the Department of the Interior should take steps without further delay to enlist the fullest cooperation of the Department of Agriculture.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

THE REMONETIZATION OF SILVER

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I present an article from the Times, of Fargo, Cass County, N. Dak., of Thursday, December 17, 1931, entitled "End of Depression Seen in Return of Silver," being an article by Hon. Jonathan Bourne, jr., former United States Senator and for 10 years president of the Republican Publicity Association, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the matter was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Times, Fargo, Cass County, N. Dak., of December 17, 1931]

END OF DEPRESSION SEEN IN RETURN OF SILVER—VAST INCREASE IN PUBLIC BUYING WILL RESULT, SAYS BOURNE—ALL PEOPLE BENEFITED—PRESENT INDEBTEDNESS IS TWENTY-FIVE TIMES GREATER THAN ALL OUR GOLD

(By Jonathan Bourne, jr., former United States Senator and for 10 years president of the Republican Publicity Association)

Suppose that a bill remonetizing silver were introduced and passed in both houses the same day without any previous publicity for an effort to obtain such legislation; suppose the President should immediately thereafter sign the bill the day of its passage; what would be the result?

Within 24 hours the radio and cablegraphic distribution of this information throughout the world would contemporaneously the world over make an ounce of silver worth $1,2929, as compared with an ounce of fine gold now worth $20.67.

You may deny this assertion, but you can not intelligently disprove its correctness.

The purchasing power of over 50 per cent of the entire world's population now using silver as its sole yardstick of exchange and business transactions would contemporaneously be quadrupled, resulting in the creation of a market which would more than absorb all the surplus of our raw materials and manufactured products.

Within a year prices of wheat, cotton, corn, and other agricultural products would be trebled, all our present agricultural land values throughout the United States would be more than trebled, thereby transforming the present frozen assets of the country banks in agricultural communities into liquid assets.

The unemployed-labor problem would be solved.

Both labor and capital would be benefited.

Contentment, happiness, lucrative occupation would be substituted for discontentment, despair, with their inevitable resultant tragedies.

All classes of society would be benefited, even including the gold monometallists who for more than the past century have foolishly thought by forcing the nations of the world to a gold standard and by controlling through their ownership of the principal gold mines of the world they could dominate and control world prices. They fail to realize that, if successful, ultimately a revolution would spring from the people and take from them their greedy accumulations acquired, not through honest business methods, industry, acumen, and thrift but rather by manipulations, chicanery, and graft.

It is estimated that our present national, State, municipal, county, and individual indebtedness of the United States is over $125,000,000,000, most of same being payable in gold.

We are informed that we have in the United States less than $5,000,000,000 in gold.

Less than $5,000,000,000 of gold as the keystone of the arch on which an indebtedness of over one hundred and twenty-five billions must rest must certainly ultimately result in financial disaster unless this keystone be increased in relative size and stability. This can best be accomplished by the earliest possible remonetization of silver by the United States without waiting for the consent, assent, or cooperation of any other nation on earth.

How can this be best brought about?

By making the remonetization of silver an issue in every congressional district in our country. Let every agricultural, labor, and commercial organization in the United States bring up this subject for intelligent discussion and issue a mandate by resolution to their Senators and Members of Congress, instructing them to vote for or against such legislation. Request all candidates for the Presidency and Vice Presidency in both parties to declare their attitude on this question and pledge their honor if elected either to sign or veto such legislation if presented according to the mandates received from their constituency. Should they refuse to obey these mandates, then defeat them at the next opportunity for reelection.

Remember that in 1894 the Knights of Labor, the American Federation of Labor, National Farmers' Alliance and Industrial Union, the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, the United Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen, and the United Mine Workers of America all united in petitioning Congress for the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 and the restoration of the money of our Constitution.

These organizations represented at that time over 4,000,000 of our voters and indirectly represented over one-third of our entire population.

If the world's and our own present political, economic, and business chaotic uncertainty had existed in 1894, Congress would have enacted the legislation remonetizing silver on the basis of 16 to 1. Had the President vetoed the bill, it would probably have passed over his veto, or Bryan unquestionably would have been elected President in 1896.

UTILIZATION OF WATER RESOURCES OF THE SACRAMENTO, SAN JOAQUIN, AND KERN RIVERS, CALIF.

Mr. JOHNSON submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 177), which was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation:

Resolved, That the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, or a duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to make a complete investigation with respect to proposed legislation providing for the ultimate utilization of the water resources of the Sacramento, San Joaquin, and Kern Rivers, in the State of California, including irrigation and reclamation, improvement of navigation, flood control, and power development, as outlined in House Document No. 791 of the Seventy-first Congress, third session. For the purposes of this resolution such committee or subcommittee is authorized to hold hearings, to sit and act at such times and places within the United States, and to employ such clerical and stenographic assistance as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic service to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The committee or subcommittee is further authorized to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to take testimony, and the expense attendant upon the work of the committee or subcommittee shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate, but shall not exceed $20,000. Such committee or subcommittee shall make a report of the results of such investigation with recommendations to the Seventy-second Congress, second session.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT—APPROVAL OF A BILL

Messages in writing from the President of the United States submitting several nominations were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also announced that on March 1, 1932, the President approved and signed the act (S. 315) for the relief of Lemuel Simpson.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7912) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] to suspend the rule in order that he may offer an amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, these are extraordinary times. If conditions were normal, the appropriation for roads would not need to be earmarked in such a way as to insure that the construction work should be done exclusively by freemen.

I favor the language inserted in the agricultural appropriation bill by the House, and I have no objection whatever to the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE].

Mr. President, it is difficult for me to believe that our people, regardless of their political affiliations, will be in sympathy with a Federal measure which permits convict labor to compete with freemen on employment opportunities which may be offered through the medium of Federal construction projects. What will be the popular reaction to a Federal law which permits convict competition with freemen in the quest for jobs vitally needed by our freemen in order that they may provide themselves and their families with the necessities of life? Based on my own experience, I feel confident that the reaction of our people in all walks of life will be almost unanimous for a ban on convict labor in the construction of Federal projects.

Many millions of our own people are idle. They urgently need work to keep themselves and their dependents from becoming public charges. Employment on road construction will probably help someone to avert a mortgage foreclosure on his modest home. The homes of our workingmen represent the savings of a lifetime of hard toil. Road construction work, too, will provide funds which will enable many of our workers to pay their taxes, in many instances delinquent taxes, and their usual share of it will go to feed, clothe, and house those incarcerated at the expense of the State. It will also direct their paths to employment instead of to charity headquarters.

Mr. President, think of the menace to our national welfare that will be engendered by the employment of convict labor on Federal construction projects, while thousands of freemen are clamoring for opportunities to work. Surely, the morale of many of our people will be seriously shaken under such conditions. It is not difficult for us to visualize the ill effect such a situation would have upon the minds of our people, who, by the employment of convict labor, would be deprived or urgently needed jobs. They surely would be resentful of such a paradoxical situation, under which they are asked to pay taxes for the maintenance of a penal system which would provide convict labor for the jobs that these freemen themselves need to enable them to earn money to pay these taxes.

Picture the mental anguish of freemen, urgently in need of gainful employment, who hopefully make application for jobs on a Federal construction project only to find that every job on the project has been filled by convict labor. What a terrific shock such a disappointment is to a man who is jobless and whose hungry wife and children wait hopefully at home for his return with the glad tidings that he has found a job, the wages of which might enable him to save his modest home from mortgage foreclosure proceedings, besides assuring the family enough to eat and the bare necessities of modern life.

Mr. President, during this session of Congress the walls of the Senate Chamber have resounded time and time again with demands for Federal relief for our unemployed people. Many of these demands were characterized as "doles," and were refused largely on the ground that our people wanted work and not charity. I believe that Congress should be consistent in times like these. If Federal funds are to be used in construction projects, let us be certain that we are providing employment opportunities for our freemen, who urgently need work to sustain themselves and families and to maintain their homes. Our convicts have no worry in this regard; they are housed, clothed, and fed.

Mr. President, I must add that the best safeguard against a national relief system in times of economic distress is a sound plan to provide employment opportunities for our jobless freemen.

This bill would provide work for many of our unemployed people, and we should be certain in these times that these jobs are filled by our freemen who are seeking work and not by convicts. Let us restore to the bill the House provision prohibiting convict labor on Federal projects.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I simply desire to call attention to the situation with regard to the order of business.

Yesterday, when the Senate took a recess, there was pending a motion of my colleague [Mr. TRAMMELL] to suspend the rules in order that he might offer his amendment to this bill. Of course, I take it that that motion is debatable and it is in order to discuss it. After that there will come up the question which has been discussed by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] about the use of convicts on public roads. That, however, is not now before the Senate. The question now is on the suspension of the rules; and, of course, as I said, that question is debatable.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question will be stated by the Chair when the debate is concluded.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I understand that the pending question relates to the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL]; and, of course, I understand, as well as the Senate understands, that the reason why the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] just made his speech on convict labor is because yesterday a very distinguished gentleman in Pennsylvania announced his candidacy against him for election to the Senate. And while I apologize to the Senate for not speaking to the pending amendment, I assure you it relates to another important question.

Some days ago I took occasion to make a speech upon the floor of the Senate with reference to the present condition of the Public Treasury, the economic conditions of the country, the inability of the people to meet the taxes—State, county, and Federal—that were being imposed upon them, and I cried out with my weak voice, as best I could, against Government extravagance and increased governmental expenditures. I hoped that what was said might bring a sympathetic word of cheer from those in high places in the administration of this Government, that they might cooperate with us in effecting some retrenchment in Government expenditures. In the course of those feeble remarks I spoke incidentally of some expenditures that were subject to criticism to such an extent that almost in themselves they create laughter; but it seems that I am charged by the distinguished Secretary of Agriculture with having been very unfair, with having spoken without facts and without figures. It is because of this interview carried in the Editor and Publisher—a periodical that goes throughout the country to the newspaper and periodical publishers—criticizing my speech that I rise now to say something with reference to the matter.

I am sorry that the Secretary of Agriculture criticizes as a whole my utterances when they were made so sincerely, in the interest of effecting some economies and retrenchments. What I said with reference to the issuance of farmers' bulletins, and the amount expended for that purpose, was incidental to the broad and bigger question that I was discussing; I was out hunting for bears, not minks. Of course, I console myself with the thought that every time the Secretary of Agriculture speaks it is in fighting opposition to some one who has taken a different position from him.

I recall that last year, when we were trying to give some relief to some unfortunate people in the country and a majority of the Senate were in favor of doing so, the Secretary of Agriculture injected himself into the matter and heaped caustic criticism and condemnation upon the efforts of the distinguished leader on this side of the aisle, the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and his distinguished colleague, the late Senator Caraway; but the Secretary's words fell on deaf ears, as his expressions generally do. No one ever knew what he was driving at. Throughout he was splitting hairs as to the effect and meaning of a dole.

Then a little while later the Secretary of Agriculture got into a controversy with the distinguished ex-Secretary of the Treasury, one of the most illustrious Members on this side of the aisle, the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]; and, of course, the Secretary's attempted answer to the exposé and analysis by the distinguished junior Senator from Virginia of the statements of the Secretary of Agriculture was simply pitiful. Why, I saw friends of the Secretary of Agriculture over on the other side of the aisle—of course, there were only one or two of them—bow their heads in humiliation over the spectacle he presented in his unfair criticisms and unwarranted assertions in regard to the action of the junior Senator from Virginia while he was Secretary of the Treasury.

The other night, when the Secretary made his radio address, when the President of the United States had been collaborating with both sides of the Senate and both sides of the House, as he has been doing now for more than two years and a half, constantly making appeals to them to offer him counsel and advice and cooperation in trying to lift this country from the mire of this depression in which it has become bogged, everybody connected with the administration who really wanted to see something done in the interest of the American people and business was withholding any partisan expressions; but the Secretary of Agriculture, broadcasting his speech over a nation-wide network, was holding the President up as the great superman of all time, as the man who had led this country and had put over these wonderful constructive measures, evidencing tremendous and unparalleled leadership. He turned a nonpartisan into a partisan discussion.

He threw the fry into the pan. That is his injudicious and imprudent way, and I can appreciate, as others appreciate, that even the President is unable to bridle and tame his unruly disposition. So in this exposé in Editor and Publisher he says this:

> Consequently he asked Editor and Publisher to place before newspaper editors of the country the facts concerning Government publications, about which much merriment has been made recently in the Senate.
> "If I object to most of the recent comment on bulletins, it is because it obviously is based on misinformation which many editors appear to have accepted as trustworthy. When a Senator echoes a propagandist in suggesting that the Government could save $20,000,000 if we stopped printing bulletins, it is claptrap."

Of course, when he thought about claptrap he remembered that bulletin he had issued, How to Make a Cat Trap. That is how the word "claptrap" came to him.

I am not going to refer to the Secretary of Agriculture as did his distinguished fellow citizen, Jim Reed, of Missouri. Of course, Senator Reed had known him for many years. They were neighbors, fellow Missourians. Mr. Reed referred to him as "the steam whistle of a fertilizer plant." [Laughter.] I do not go that far. I do not say that, because I have respect for the fertilizer plant. [Laughter.]

I read further:

> "But the gentlemen who originated and transmitted the outburst were in blissful ignorance of the facts," he added.
> The Secretary was speaking of a speech made in the Senate February 6 by Senator PAT HARRISON, widely quoted. Senator HARRISON ridiculed such publications as Lamb as You Like It and Love Life of a Bullfrog and others.

He stated further that the publications did not cost much, that they cost but 1¼ cents a copy.

I want to congratulate the committee in charge of this bill for having reduced the appropriation to some extent. It is made at least $75,000 less than Mr. Hyde requested in the economy program, in the retrenchment policy of the administration. That is one of the reasons why he is angry, because he is not getting all the money he desires for this particular work.

I have no objection to the Government issuing legitimate bulletins. I think some bulletins have been useful. It is my belief, however, that the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Labor, the Department of Commerce, and the other departments, have gone wild in the preparation and issuance of bulletins. I believe that it would be a very nice thing and a very wise thing at this particular time, when we are called upon to balance the Budget because of a deficit of $4,000,000,000, to forego for a little while the sending out of so many bulletins and the preparation of so many new bulletins as are being undertaken by these departments here in Washington.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, not a word was said in the speech I delivered on February 6 that was of a partisan nature. I tried to put it on a different plane. I tried to call the attention of the country to the deplorable situation confronting us and confronting the people, in the hope that we might create sentiment to uphold our hands here in cutting down some of the expenditures and assisting us in the effort not to raise more than is necessary the taxes in the new tax bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES in the chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. REED. I listened with great entertainment to the delightful speech made by the Senator on February the 6th.

Mr. HARRISON. I am glad the Senator was entertained.

Mr. REED. Like everyone else within sound of his voice, I was very much entertained by the Senator's humor. But I did get the impression—though perhaps the Senator did not mean to give such an impression—that this lyrical pamphlet called "The Love Life of the Bullfrog," or whatever it was, had recently been issued by the Department of Agriculture, and I was shocked to discover that it had been issued under President Wilson's administration. Has the Senator never protested against this before?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I would like to recall to the Senator one thing, if he heard my speech, which I doubt, though I accept his statement when he says he was entertained; it is so hard to entertain the Senator, because he is so serious, that I am glad that one time he was entertained. I said in the course of that speech that I denounced the issuance of such bulletin upon the part of a Democratic administration the same as I would if it were issued by a Republican administration.

Mr. REED. I did not hear that.

Mr. HARRISON. I play no favorites in the matter. Some wonderful pamphlets have been issued, as I said, both by the Department of Agriculture and the Republican administration. Some have been issued which should never have been prepared and issued.

Mr. REED. I agree with the Senator in that.

Mr. HARRISON. I am glad the Senator and I agree on one thing. [Laughter.]

The Secretary, in the course of this interview, seeks to give the impression that there is no great cost involved in the issuance of Government bulletins and Government periodicals; that it costs only 1¼ cents apiece for these pamphlets; that only two hundred and some odd thousand dollars was expended for the bulletins.

Ah, Mr. President, that was not what I was hitting at. Dumb as is the Secretary of Agriculture, let me tell him that it is not merely the expense of printing at the Government Printing Office of a pamphlet that places a heavy burden upon the taxpayers of this country. These pamphlets number, according to one of the lists I have here, to 1,647 or more. There are three or four pages in this list of publications. It is not merely the expense of the printing of those pamphlets, of course; but how are they prepared? The department sends scientists not only all over this country but they send them througout the world, if it is necessary, in order sometimes to procure the particular information the scientist says is needed in the preparation of this great work, which is to live as a testimonial to that particular scientist. Then, when they get all the data together, it takes a corps of typewriters and perhaps stenographers and colaborers. Who is paying for that? It is not being paid out of the particular appropriation being made here. The Government, however, is paying the salaries of these particular individuals. Every piece of paper employed in writing them out is paid for by the Government of the United States, and it takes time to do that, and the preparation of them costs money. If they were not thus prepared, they would not be worth anything at all.

That is not all of the expense. I used to serve in the House of Representatives, and year by year—and I delighted to do it—I would send out 30,000 copies of a list of the publications, one to every voter in my district, and the ladies did not vote then, inclosing one of these lists of bulletins published by the departments. I would say, "Mark 10, 15, or 20." I make no excuse or apologies for what I did. That is the way the thing was done. The Government paid for them, and we sent them out. The Government pays the clerks. The pamphlets go to all the voters, and the voters write back to us. The letter that went to each voter was on Government stationery, ordinarily; it went under Government frank, and the Government paid for the postal deficit that was created in sending them out.

I have seen sacks and sacks of mail piled high, sent by automobile or truck or what not to the station, to be loaded into train cars, and to go to various destinations throughout the country. All of those things cost money, and the taxpayers are paying for it. Yet Mr. Hyde, in his ingenious statement, says, "These pamphlets cost but 1¼ cents each." I have here on my desk a bunch of them, and some of these cost more than a cent and a quarter. Of course, the more printed, the less per copy is the cost. Why print too many in order to get a smaller cost per copy?

That is not all, however. Our constituents write for these periodicals, and they go under Government frank, free of postage, and to-day there is in the Post Office Department a deficit of over $155,000,000. I say this figure, approaching $20,000,000, representing the cost of the preparation, the printing, and the distribution of Government periodicals and bulletins and pamphlets, is quite a conservative estimate.

I notice that in his report made this year for 1931 the Public Printer says:

> First rank as a publisher is an easy honor of the Department of Agriculture, whose publications are about treble the number issued by any other department or establishment of the Government. The Department of Agriculture also qualified as a member of the million-dollar group of Government Printing Office customers with printing orders totaling $1,080,021.83 * * *.
> During the year 1931 there were printed 29,866,506 copies of agricultural bulletins, including 12,246,218 farmers' bulletins.

That does not give the number printed for the Department of Commerce, which has shown a more amazing increase in Government extravagance and expenditures than that shown by any other department in the whole Government service. That does not include the amount expended by the Department of Labor, which includes the Children's Bureau. It is an amazing amount.

He says some of them are sold. They sold 756 copies of the Agricultural Yearbook last year at $1.50 each, according to the report, and there were printed more than 400,000 copies of those Agricultural Yearbooks. Of course, most of them were distributed free, 380,138 in number, and Senators know how heavy they are and how much cost is involved in sending them out. It is all right in normal times to send out this literature, but at this particular time, when the country is in stress, when people by the millions are being sold out of their possessions, people who find it impossible to go to the tax collector's office and pay the assessments against them, can we not afford to forego a little of this expense? Can we not cut down the amount a little bit? Can we not for a year or two years forego the sending out of these 20,000 or 30,000 bulletins and Agricultural Yearbooks and all these periodicals?

The farmer in my section of the country, who realizes that his State budget is not balanced, who can not make ends meet, who has sadness in his heart, and who is threatened with losing everything in the world he possesses, welcomes any approach to retrenchment at this particular time. I know it is a mere bagatelle. I know it is a small amount. I know when we come to affecting a saving of $100,000 here or $1,000,000 there and then come in and wipe out all such savings by appropriating $750,000,000 for some purpose it is inexcusable.

We are up against it, Mr. President. We must realize it. The Secretary of Agriculture and the President of the United States and his Cabinet, and every other man in high place, whether he be in the House of Representatives or the Senate, ought to cooperate at this time in the interest of effecting as many economies as are possible so that we can save as much as possible in the tax bill from being put upon the backs of the American people in the way of increased taxes. Already it has climbed up and up, until I believe we will now have to raise about $1,200,000,000 in increased taxes this year.

The authorities have gone even to a manufacturer's sales tax in order to do it. They have found the job a difficult one. But unless we, in a spirit of cooperation, here in the Senate and in the House, try to apply good common sense in effecting economies and retrenchments, we will not meet the issue squarely and do our part by the American people. It is idle talk and unwise and unfair for one of the spokesmen of the administration, high in the councils of his party, close to the chair of his chief in the White House, to try to criticize every effort made to effect economies and retrenchments in governmental expenditures.

As I have said, the report of the Public Printer shows many millions and millions of these periodicals and pamphlets are thrown out annually as waste paper because there is no need in the world for them. I am going to place in the RECORD a list of the pamphlets issued by the Department of Agriculture. I ask permission that the list may be placed at the end of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See Exhibit A.)

Mr. HARRISON. The Secretary further said in his statement, to which I have referred, that I had stated that 60 per cent of these publications are wasted by his department. I did not say it. I invited the attention of the Senate in my remarks on February 6 to the pamphlets and showed them to the Senate as they were issued by the Department of Labor, relating to such subjects as "How to Raise Children on a Canal Boat." My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] was seated here and heard me. I talked about pamphlets issued by the Children's Bureau and other bureaus of the Government, not confining my remarks to the particular thing which my friend the Secretary purports to answer.

The Postmaster General showed in his report this year that the cost to the Post Office Department for the distribution of frankable matter in this country for the last year would have been $4,306,000 if the Post Office Department had issued no frank for that purpose. For the other branches of the Government it would have been $4,336,000. There is more than $8,600,000 that might have been saved to the Government. Then in another place in his report he gives the number of pamphlets that went out under the franking privilege. The Postmaster General's report shows that there were mailed under the penalty privilege by departments of the Government, exclusive of the Post Office Department, 43,000,000 pounds of mailable matter (353,000,000 pieces, the revenue upon which would have been $9,886,000. There were mailed under franking privileges by Members of the Congress 33,000,000 pieces, of a weight in pounds of 4,500,000, the cost of which if postage had been paid would have been $723,000. By others there was mailed frankable matter the postage upon which if paid would have been $128,000. Then a list of the publications mailed free in the county and State items is given. We lost through the privilege of franking by the Department of Agriculture and the other departments of the Government and by the Congress at least $11,000,000 in postal revenues last year, according to the statement of the Postmaster General. All of this overhead expense enters into the cost of operating the Government as a result of sending these matters out to the country free of charge.

Mr. President, in closing I merely express the hope that other members of the Cabinet will not misconstrue the purpose of my speeches. I am shooting for bigger game than merely the issuance of bulletins by the Secretary of Agriculture. Let them be not so quick to take offense, but try to cooperate a little bit and give us a little encouragement here instead of bushwhacking and backbiting in the matter.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, the pending question is my motion to suspend the rules for the purpose of offering the amendment which I have suggested, is it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the pending question.

Mr. TRAMMELL. For some two years and a half past my colleague [Mr. FLETCHER] and I have been endeavoring to get some kind of relief for our people for the damage which was inflicted through the administration of the Mediterranean fruit-fly quarantine and the extermination campaign that was carried on during 1929 and 1930.

I have proposed an amendment to the pending Agricultural Department appropriation bill and asked for the privilege of having it placed on the bill because there has been such a great delay in the matter of getting some inquiry made into the matter, which is of such great importance to the State of Florida. I am going to give briefly a short history of our efforts to get some consideration through the Department of Agriculture first and then through the Congress.

Both my colleague and I some two years and a half ago introduced bills providing for an appropriation to pay for losses and damages suffered by our growers. The bills were referred to the Department of Agriculture. The Secretary of Agriculture after some time reported favorably, or without objection, upon the bill which was introduced by my colleague providing for an appropriation of $10,000,000 to cover damages that came within certain restrictions and provisions set forth in the bill. At that time we probably may have obtained a favorable report from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry; but soon a fight arose largely between Secretary Hyde and Mr. WOOD, chairman of the Appropriations Committee in the House, in regard to funds with which the department was seeking to carry on the campaign in relation to its eradication work. The Department of Agriculture then appealed to us not to push the question of an appropriation with which to pay claims at that time, but to wait until the work was completed. That has been over two years ago. We thought it was advisable, therefore, not at that time to urge the legislation, which had been approved by the Department of Agriculture, proposing to make direct appropriations for the purpose of settling the claim.

Then we had an adjournment of Congress. At the next session of the Congress, in 1930, both my colleague and I took up the matter in the form of a measure asking for a direct appropriation to pay claims for losses that had been inflicted upon the farmers and growers of my State. By this time the Secretary of Agriculture disapproved of the idea of a direct appropriation, to which he had formerly made no objection, and reported against our bills. Following this, it was intimated that he had no particular objection to a survey being made. I then introduced a bill providing for a survey to be made. A House bill provided that it should be made only by the Secretary of Agriculture. It was my opinion that it should be made by at least three persons, two of whom should be citizens of Florida, to be selected by the Secretary of Agriculture. So, abandoning the idea of getting a direct appropriation, as is usual when damage has been suffered in matters of this kind, I introduced a measure asking that we have three appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture, two of whom should be residents of the State of Florida, to constitute a board to investigate the situation in my State.

This measure, of course, in the regular order was referred to the Secretary of Agriculture. He replied, criticizing it and ridiculing it. Many of his comments were not warranted by the provisions of the measure and anyone reading them with an unbiased mind would say so, if he read the Secretary's criticisms and the measure. He stated in that connection, in 1930, that he would not object to the setting up of a board to make inquiry if the measure was amended in certain particulars. He wanted the membership of the board increased from three to five. He wanted them appointed, two from the Department of Agriculture, two to be citizens of Florida, and one at large. The measure was then amended identically according to his suggestion. Being advised that he would have no objection to it if so amended, the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry so amended it, and the bill was reported to the Senate and passed. It went to the House, but was not passed by the House at that session.

I have come back to the Senate at this session with identically the same bill to which the Secretary of Agriculture then said he did not object, a bill which was redrafted to conform to his wishes. That is the measure which I am endeavoring to get placed upon the pending appropriation bill in the form of an amendment in order that we may not have any further delay in the investigation. We have been delayed and delayed. I think it would be no imposition upon the Senate or the House or upon the Department of Agriculture to have the amendment adopted as a part of the Agricultural Department appropriation bill. So far as the question of policy is concerned, the provision provides merely for a survey. It does not attempt to set up any basis of damage whatever, but on the contrary provides that the inquiry shall be without prejudice to Congress and without prejudice to the Secretary of Agriculture, and that the information shall be gathered only for information and the consideration of the Secretary of Agriculture and the Congress.

We have all kinds of investigations here. It is very little trouble ordinarily for a Senator to introduce a resolution based merely upon rumors and to get an investigation that often costs the Government $25,000 or $50,000. That modus operandi is in process here almost weekly. We have a meritorious case. We have been begging and fighting for at least 2 years to get the case of the people of our State considered. That is all the amendment which I have submitted proposes to do. It provides for a board of 5 to be designated by the Secretary of Agriculture, 2 of whom shall be employees of his department, 2 of whom shall be citizens of Florida, and 1 a citizen at large, who shall perform their duties within 90 days and be paid only $10 a day salary for the time actually engaged. They are to go into the territory involved and gather the information.

This is a precaution and a preliminary step which has not heretofore been required, so far as I know, in regard to the losses suffered in any State. Take the legislation to compensate people for losses on account of foot-and-mouth disease; they were not held back 2 or 3 or 4 years and then even denied a survey to ascertain whether or not there had been damage. The Agricultural Department itself came in and recommended an appropriation to compensate them. The very bill which we are considering at the present time has a continuing appropriation of over $4,000,000 to reimburse people who have lost cattle on account of the Government's efforts to eradicate bovine tuberculosis. It also carries an appropriation to reimburse people who have suffered loss on account of the Government's efforts to stamp out the foot-and-mouth disease in cattle.

We are not asking for a direct reimbursement; we are not saying that we are entitled to a given amount of damages, and that we should be awarded such an amount; but we are merely asking that a governmental agency shall investigate the situation.

Of course, I could tell the Senate about a good many instances where it looks as though some of our fruit growers and truck farmers were terribly mistreated; they experienced injury and damages which were absolutely unnecessary in carrying on an intelligent and efficient eradication campaign; but we have not that question under consideration at the present time. The only question we now have up is the matter of a survey. I am going to read just an extract from a letter from Mr. Jesse R. Crandal, of Winter Park, Fla., dated January 16, 1932, which pictures not only his experience but the situation in regard to many. He says:

> The United States Government came into my grove and deliberately destroyed about 400 out of 453 of my trees, and now refuses to pay me anything for the damage they deliberately and needlessly did. My grove did not have an orange in it, there was no chance for a Mediterranean fly to be there, yet they went in and sprayed the tender trees with a big, powerful sprayer, pulled by a big tractor, and killed my trees and deprived me of my property and the income from it for five years while I am raising another grove, which I do not have the money to set out.

He says, in an effort to try to rehabilitate his grove—

> I have set the trees twice since they killed them, but they put so much poison spray on the trees that the water washed it down into the ground and killed the trees I set each time. Now, I have been unjustly turned out of my job and have no money to buy new trees with, to reset this year.

Of course this is a very severe case, but there are numerous others of similar character. We are not, by my amendment, saying that this man should be awarded a specific amount of damage, but we are merely asking that there be established some governmental agency to investigate the situation, gather the facts for consideration by the Secretary of Agriculture, and then later for the consideration of Congress.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. KING. I was wondering if the Department of Agriculture is not in this instance, as in some other instances, trying to prevent an investigation of the transgressions, ignorance, and mistakes—unjustifiable mistakes, inexcusable mistakes—of its so-called scientists? I recall, if the Senator will pardon me, receiving a letter a number of years ago with respect to the destruction of cattle in one of the States—I shall not mention its name—wherein it was charged that the officials of the United States Government, without any excuse whatever—and they later confessed their mistake—ordered a large number of cattle killed and instituted a quarantine. In that instance the Federal Government was compelled to pay, or at least did pay, for the mistakes of those Federal officials.

I received a letter, may I say to the Senator, if he will pardon me, at the time it was alleged that the Mediterranean fly was about to destroy the trees and the vegetation of Florida, from a citizen of Florida inclosing a copy of an advertisement which had been published, offering $1,000 if any person would bring to the one inserting the advertisement a single Mediterranean fly. No one ever applied for the $1,000 which was offered; and the writer of the letter insisted that the Government officials had acted without any reason whatever, and that some of the State officials, profiting by the new jobs that would be furnished to them, were cooperating with the Federal officials in putting over upon the people of the State a campaign wholly without merit. I do not mean to challenge attention to the latter facts for the purpose of arguing that those who have been injured ought not to be compensated by some one, but, obviously, if the statement made with respect to the nonexistence of the Mediterranean fly is true, a number of the Federal Government's officials ought to be discharged for inefficiency and failure properly to perform their duty.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, a good many people entertain similar views to those expressed in the letter to which the Senator from Utah refers. It has seemed a little peculiar to me that the Secretary of Agriculture should first say, about two and a half years ago, that he had no objection to the appropriation of a given amount—I think it was $10,000,000—with which to pay these claims, and then a year later should recede from that position and say the thing that ought to be done was to provide for a survey; and now he opposes the survey to which he said in February, 1931, he had no objection. In the survey measure of February, 1931, I conformed, as I think the Senator from Utah will remember, to the wishes of the Secretary and provided for a board, which the Secretary said would be all right. Now, however, he has receded from that position. In other words, it seems as though he does not want any inquiry whatever to be made. The question is, Why? Of course, he may have his own reasons for that; I will not undertake to say what his excuse may be, but it seems he does not want any inquiry made now. So I am appealing to the Senate as a matter of justice to provide that a survey shall be made and that there may be no further delay.

The people of Florida when the Mediterranean fruit-fly scare first came upon them were not experts or scientists in diseases of trees and the eradication of pests. So at first they rather accepted, at least a great many did, the idea that the Mediterranean fly actually existed in Florida, and they showed a great spirit of cooperation to try to get rid of the pest. However, from time to time they began to get skeptical about it; they began to wonder if there actually were any Mediterranean fruit flies in Florida. I myself frankly say that I doubt whether there were any Mediterranean flies ever in Florida.

We are not asking for compensation for the general damage suffered by the people of Florida on account of the destruction of the market for their fruit for one or two seasons—and thousands of growers were pauperized on account of that alone—we are merely asking that a survey be made, an inquiry in regard to the specific and direct damage and to the specific property. It does seem to me that we are entitled to that consideration, even if it necessitates authority upon the part of the Senate for an amendment to be offered to this particular bill.

People all over the country are interested, because Florida has a cosmopolitan population. We are proud of the fact that we have citizens from every State of the Union. A great many people from other States own grove properties in Florida, and my correspondence has been from people out of the State who own grove property in Florida about as much as from people in the State.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am interested in the fundamental proposition involved in the Senator's amendment, and I should like to ask him a question. We are asked in this bill to make an appropriation in contemplation of a grasshopper plague in certain States. Would the Senator contend if the Government embarks upon that protective measure that it accepts in connection therewith a responsibility for the ultimate administration of the measure thus provided for the protection of the people in the areas involved and which is extended at their risk? In other words, are we put upon warning when we undertake to fight the grasshopper plague that we must do it at our own Federal risk and must respond in ultimate damages in case the result is unsatisfactory? Is that the Senator's position?

Mr. TRAMMELL. My position is that if, on account of inefficiency, recklessness, and ruthlessness, the agents of the Government do damage to a person's property, in equity and justice that person ought to be compensated, just as when a mail messenger driving a mail wagon by recklessness and disregard for human life strikes somebody down on the street the Government pays the damages. The Government is constantly paying claims of that kind because of the torts of its agents.

The Senator from Michigan intimates that in the case of the appropriation on account of the grasshopper plague the people involved invite the interposition of the Government. I do not know anything about that, but the people of Florida did not invite the activities of the Government against the Mediterranean fly. We had those activities imposed upon us; we were helpless, we were quarantined, we could not remove our fruit from Florida, and the income of thousands of people was destroyed. We had to yield, and our people yielded in a law-abiding manner.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to his colleague?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. With reference to the inquiry made by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], while we are not dealing now with grasshoppers or anything that may rest in the future, I want to call attention to the fact—and my colleague will agree with the statement—that the Department of Agriculture has never denied that in connection with the work of eradicating the fruit fly there were legitimate and proper losses for which the people in interest had a right to submit claims. The department has never denied that, but has admitted it. It has admitted all along that there were legitimate and proper losses which ought to be compensated for, and it has never denied Federal responsibility. It has sometimes said that the States ought to contribute 50 per cent of that loss, but it never has openly denied the responsibility of the Government. I can show a letter upon the subject admitting such responsibility.

Mr. TRAMMELL. My colleague and I have never contended that any reimbursement we received should be otherwise than upon the same basis as in the case of other States.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is correct.

Mr. TRAMMELL. In other words, if 50 per cent is required, we answer that we are not trying to get 100 per cent.

Mr. FLETCHER. That remains for the future. The question involved here is an investigation as to what losses were suffered.

Mr. TRAMMELL. That is all.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I have had some correspondence and several conferences with regard to the pest which was found in Florida some years ago. I do not think the department ever admitted any Federal liability. If so, it was limited to the fruit that was not infested and was destroyed.

Mr. FLETCHER. I can read from the testimony of Mr. Marlatt and letters of Secretary Hyde and reports on the resolutions and bills that have been submitted which, I think, will satisfy the Senator on that point. They reported favorably on the first resolution which I introduced admitting the principle of liability. As to what the Government would be liable for as an element of damage is still an open question; but they did admit that for the actual losses the Government was responsible. I can show the record as to that if the Senator desires to see it. This measure, however, does not propose to deal with the elements of damage, or what proportion the State should bear, or what proportion the Federal Government should bear. It simply provides for making a survey to ascertain what the losses were. Afterwards, when it comes to a question of appropriation, we can deal with the whole matter, and determine what part of it, if any, the Federal Government is liable for.

There is no doubt that there was destruction of property. The department officials know that. Everybody knows it. It is a question that is not open to doubt at all. There was serious destruction of property.

I do not want to interrupt my colleague now; but a little later on, if I may be permitted, I will show what the department's position is with reference to that matter. All we are asking now is to have a beginning. They objected to any appropriation being made until the work was completed. That held up the first joint resolution I introduced on the subject. Now, when the work is finally completed, they say, "We can not tell what the damage is until we make an investigation and see what elements of damage there are and what losses the people have suffered, and then we will consider the question of taking care of them."

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I remember quite well the history of the legislation referred to by my colleague. I first introduced a bill on the subject. A little later he introduced one. At the time of the introduction of his bill, representatives of the growers of Florida came here. They and my colleague conferred with the department, and the Secretary of Agriculture approved the form of the bill. In fact I think it was drafted very largely according to the suggestions of his officers in charge of this particular work. The Secretary has receded from that position. We are not trying to fix the liability, but we are trying to get an investigation. We do not want to have to wait a year or two longer, when this matter has been pending now for more than two years. My amendment does not involve any great expenditure. I propose to suggest in my amendment, when it is formally offered, a modification with regard to appropriations to provide that the funds for this purpose shall be used out of the Mediterranean fruit-fly fund which was previously appropriated for the fiscal year 1931. It involves no new appropriation whatever.

I desire to appeal to my fellow Members of the Senate to allow us to have this amendment placed on the bill so that this question can be disposed of and we can start the inquiry.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Has the Senator made any unofficial or preliminary survey to indicate to what extent he thinks this damage would be measured in dollars and cents?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I have not any idea. A committee of probably a dozen growers, headed by the citrus-fruit organizations and by the Florida clearing-house association and W. J. Howard, a very extensive orange grower in Florida—who, by the way, happened to be the Republican candidate for governor at the last election, and was very substantially supported—made an inquiry and gathered together an enormous amount of claims; I forget what amount. This committee was under the impression that with those claims they could go to the Secretary of Agriculture and could get a recommendation from him for legislation for an appropriation, but, of course, they were not successful in that. Knowing the adverse attitude of the Secretary, I doubted very much that they would succeed.

Mr. VANDENBERG. What did those claims amount to? Does the Senator remember?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I think they amounted to something like two or three million dollars, according to the basis upon which the claimants stated their damage. Of course, they would all have to be checked over and made to conform to the basis or elements of damage fixed by Congress.

Mr. VANDENBERG. All of those claimants would appear before the Senator's proposed commission and press those same types of claims?

Mr. TRAMMELL. They would present them; yes. I do not know that all of them would. I doubt that. The commission, no doubt, would make an inquiry, and these people, or a number of them, would present the character of the claims. Then the commission would report to the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Secretary of Agriculture would report to Congress.

In this situation we are under the necessity of pursuing a circuitous route that I do not know of any other State or any other people similarly situated being required to pursue; but we are accepting the situation, with the hope that we can succeed in at least getting a survey, so as to have the main question considered at a later session of Congress.

I very much hope the Senate will allow us to place this amendment on the bill. My good friend the chairman of the committee is ordinarily very generous, and I hope he will not make any special objection to this amendment. He fully appreciates and knows the situation. I have seen him display his generosity here in a number of instances, and I hope he will display it on this occasion and agree to our having this amendment placed on the bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, there are very few Senators present. I am perfectly willing to proceed, but I do not know that I am going to enlighten vacant seats very greatly on this subject.

The question is, Will the Senate, by a two-thirds vote, suspend the rule and let this amendment be offered? That is the question. About two-thirds of the Senators are absent. Less than one-third are here; and I do not know how I am to convince the two-thirds who are away. I should be glad to do it, and I am willing to proceed and take up what little time I plan to occupy. Perhaps those who are here can speak for the absent Members. If they can, very well.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, if the Senator desires to address himself to this subject, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield for that purpose?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do, though I do not like to lose the time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I was just proceeding to say that what is sought here is to set up the machinery and proceed with the accomplishment of whatever we are entitled to have accomplished, without waiting a year or two more. I will not take the time of the Senate to discuss the question as to what element of damage ought to be considered by the Department of Agriculture and by the board provided for in this measure. Nor will I take up the time of the Senate in telling the whole story of the Mediterranean fruit fly. I have before me the report of the hearings on the Agricultural Department appropriation bill for 1931, and Doctor Marlatt appeared before the committee and gave a full account of the discovery and the efforts made to combat this fruit fly, as will appear on page 655, and so forth, of those hearings.

Doctor Marlatt called it the most dangerous pest the citrus industry has ever known. His testimony will show that it was dealt with, not merely for the benefit of Florida, not merely on account of the citrus industry in Florida, but as a means of protecting the whole country against the spread of this fly, because it does spread. Therefore, the Department of Agriculture, taking this broad view of it as a necessary thing in order to protect the fruit industry of the United States, undertook to eradicate this pest, believing it to exist.

There are a great many people, as my colleague has said, who believe that the real Mediterranean fruit fly never existed in Florida at all. There are a great many people who think that this whole eradication work, the damage that was done and the loss that was suffered, was really unnecessary. I think the Department of Agriculture, with all their experts and the information they have on this subject, knowing the insect's history from the Mediterranean country throughout the world, are better prepared to pass on that question than the ordinary layman. I accepted their position about it, and endeavored to cooperate with them from the beginning to the end of the whole matter.

The fly was discovered on April 6, 1929, in an orange grove at Orlando. The fruit was sent here, was examined, the larva and the pupæ and the fly itself were examined, and the experts pronounced it the Mediterranean fruit fly.

I should say in justice to the department, too, that when some question was raised about that and it was suggested that it might be some ordinary fly which exists in connection with every kind of fruit everywhere, which did not spread to amount to anything or do a great deal of damage, the department reinforced its own views and the views of its experts and appointed a special committee to go into the subject. As Doctor Marlatt said:

> The magnitude of the problem as thus developed, together with its nation-wide concern, led the Secretary of Agriculture to seek the advice, both as to the work as above outlined and as to the possibility of eradication, of leading specialists selected from various parts of the country.
> The committee thus appointed consisted of Vernon Kellogg, permanent secretary National Research Council, Washington, D. C.; H. A. Morgan, president University of Tennessee; T. P. Cooper, dean College of Agriculture, director of extension work, Lexington, Ky.; Victor R. Gardener, director State experiment station and professor of horticulture, State College, East Lansing, Mich.; T. P. Headlee, professor of entomology, Rutgers College, New Brunswick, State entomologist of New Jersey and entomologist of State experiment station; G. A. Dean, head, department of entomology, State Agricultural College, and entomologist, State experiment station, Manhattan, Kans.; and H. J. Quayle, professor of entomology, University of California, and entomologist of citrus experiment station, Riverside.

He said in his testimony:

> These specialists submitted a report, emphasizing their belief that eradication was not only practicable but an economic necessity.

A necessity for the whole country, not merely for Florida.

> They further recommended the very considerable enlargement of the work now under way and the modification of regulations which, in their belief, would permit, under a system of sterilization and without risk of spreading the pest, the interstate movement of citrus fruits from areas which previously had been considered infested.
> At the time of the visit of this committee to Florida the research unit of the Bureau of Entomology of the department, cooperating with the Plant Quarantine and Control Administration, had just completed work which indicated the practicability of such control.

So they proceeded with that work, and they proceeded with it in a way which resulted in the complete eradication of the pest. That did not occur until November, 1930, as I remember now. About 18 months they were engaged in fighting that pest and exterminating it. They followed shipments from Florida to all parts of the country, watching the development everywhere. There were one or two places, in one instance in North Carolina, as I recall, where they found a fly which had been carried. It was necessary to do that eradication work in order to protect the country, not merely Florida.

I will not detail what they did, but undoubtedly they had to engage some new people in that work, people who had never had any connection with such work before. They had persons to make inspections, and persons to do this and to do the other, to carry out general orders, people who were inexperienced, who were new at it, and who did things which were unwarranted, which were ruthless and reckless, and which caused destruction and loss where, if conditions had been different, and they could have employed only experienced men who understood the problem, these losses would not have occurred.

That was a thing to expect in a situation of that kind. We could not hope to escape loss and damage. But it was occasioned to some extent by inexperienced and new people who did not understand what they were doing, and there were mistakes made by the department itself, because they went on to divide the State into zones, and destroyed fruit miles away from any infestation whatever, went into a man's grove and found no flies there, found no infestation, but said, "The fly is in a grove a mile away, and it will come here, and you must destroy all the fruit." They took it off the tree and burned it. Spread lime on it, 3 or 4 feet deep, and destroyed the fruit absolutely.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. I was wondering why those who have been damaged, if they have been, have not taken the same step which it appears everybody else has, and had bills introduced asking Congress to allow them to come and have their claims considered by the Committee on Claims. It appears that everything else is before the Committee on Claims and that is the way things are handled. Why can not the Senator do that in this instance?

Mr. FLETCHER. I will say to the Senator that that is what we are trying to get to. In the first place, for instance, I introduced a resolution calling for an appropriation of $10,000,000, or so much thereof as might be necessary, to take care of these claims. The department really made a favorable report on that resolution. They agreed to it in principle. They specified that 50 per cent of the loss should be borne by the States, which we should consider, of course. But they said, "Let us wait until we get the job finished, and then we will deal with these claims." So I waited. My colleague introduced a bill at the last session calling for this survey, because they said, "We can not adjust these claims until we make an examination and see what kind of claims they are, and where they exist, and make a study of the whole problem."

Mr. LOGAN. They could not do it then, could they, without some action on the part of Congress?

Mr. FLETCHER. We will have to follow that up, of course. The only reason for proposing this measure now is to lay the foundation, to get the information, and when we get the information Congress can decide how much it will allow and how much the State should allow. The whole question will come up.

Mr. LOGAN. This is to set up an instrumentality in the way of a commission, or something like that, to go out and find the facts?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; it does not call for the appropriation of another dollar. There are already funds under the appropriations for 1931, when we appropriated money to carry on this fight on the Mediterranean fruit fly, several hundred thousand dollars still left from the appropriation for that year. This proposal is to make a survey, examine and check up the claims, ascertain their nature, amount, and all the facts, and report thereon for such further action as Congress may take.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. DILL. Do I understand we are making appropriations now to fight this fly, but that this amendment is to provide for an investigation to determine what damages the Government should pay because of the fight already made?

Mr. FLETCHER. No; the fight is finished, the job is done, the fly is gone. Now, the question is, What was the amount of damages caused in this work of eradication, for which somebody should make compensation?

Mr. DILL. Then it is a malfeasance action based on something done by governmental officials about which the Senator is talking, rather than necessary damages which resulted from the destruction of the fly?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; damages growing out of the eradication work.

Mr. DILL. I want to get clear this point: Certain damages were necessary in eradicating the fly?

Mr. FLETCHER. Absolutely; we do not deny that. If the officials found infestation in a grove, they destroyed the grove, and nobody has asked for compensation for that. But suppose they found infestation in the Senator's grove, and 10 miles away I owned a grove, and the inspectors went in there and destroyed my grove. Should I not have some compensation for my loss, if there was no infestation?

Mr. DILL. I wanted to get that clear. I know that out in Iowa a great deal of destruction was caused in the treatment of cattle, and the farmers claimed that cattle which were not affected with disease were killed, and the meat was sold; and it almost caused a local war out there between those farmers and the Federal inspectors. What I am trying to get at is just how much trust we can put in these officials of the Department of Agriculture if, when we give them authority to do something, they go out and destroy where it is not necessary.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not claim that they wantonly destroyed property, but this was a new proposition down there, as I was saying awhile ago, and they had to get a lot of green people as inspectors and workers in the performance of that activity, and they did a lot of unnecessary damage.

Among other things, the department instituted quarantine regulations. They stopped the movement of fruit and vegetables out of Florida for months. The people had practically no markets anywhere. The National Guard of the State was put out on the highways and undertook to stop trucks and wagons and automobiles in order to prevent the shipment of certain fruits and vegetables out of the State during that time. So that the people had no market for their products that were considered hosts for this fly. The quarantine was modified from time to time, but not completely raised for 18 months—until November, 1930.

Outside of that, they declared certain vegetables as possible hosts, as they called them, for this fly—for instance, green peppers. Florida is a great vegetable-growing State, especially for winter vegetables, and people went to work and planted their vegetables, but when they got ready to ship the department said, "No; you can not ship those vegetables. They are hosts of the fly, and there is possible infection in them." But they never discovered during the whole history of the procedure a single fly in these vegetables about which they talked and the shipment of which they prohibited.

Not only that, but a man would go and spend his money for labor to clear his ground and fertilize his crop, he produced the crop and got it ready for market, and then the Department of Agriculture said, "You can not move that crop. You must destroy it," although there was not a single fly found in the vegetables at all, not one. They do not claim that there was. They admit they did not find any, but they said, "This is a possible host and we will not take any chances." The question as to what amount of damage shall be allowed is another question. That will come up later when we have the information as to what the losses were and how they arose.

For instance, in the report on my resolution the department indicated that they would admit their liability for the actual cost of producing the vegetables, but they would not allow anything for the prospective profit to be made. I do not find any objection to that suggestion. I am willing to accept that as a basis. In other words, let us reimburse the grower just what he is out of pocket for producing the vegetables which were ordered destroyed. They were ordered destroyed because the department suspected the vegetables were hosts, not because they were infested or ever had been infested. That is an element of damage that ought to be considered. There are unquestionably losses which the department itself will agree with the growers and producers ought to be compensated for. Then will come the question of how much the Federal Government and how much the State and local governments shall contribute to the payment of those losses. That is a question with which we will deal later. All we are asking now is that we make some headway toward starting the inquiry in order to ascertain what the losses are, how they arose, and whether the Federal Government is responsible for them or not.

I may mention in passing that a similar bill providing for a board to make the survey was introduced in the House by Representative OWEN. It received a favorable report from the department. They made a favorable report on the bill, which provided for a survey. There was a different set-up as to the board, but the same principle was involved. The department recommended an amendment, instead of making the appropriation just as my colleague proposes here now, suggesting that out of the appropriation for 1931 they should take a certain sum, to wit, $50,000, to make the survey. That bill was favorably reported in the last Congress. My colleague introduced a similar bill in the last Congress, and on February 17, 1931, the Senate passed the bill on which the Department of Agriculture had reported more or less favorably. That is practically the same bill we have here now. We are asking that this be done now and that we be not compelled to wait until there is another bill introduced and hearings had before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and a report on that bill, and then wait until that bill can be taken up on a call of the calendar and considered and finally passed, as the Senate would no doubt pass it again, I am quite sure, but probably too late for the House to act.

A similar bill has passed the Senate heretofore. All we ask now is that the amendment be placed on the pending appropriation bill so we can go on with the investigation and not be tied up here year after year waiting for some machinery to be set up to comply with the requirements of the Department of Agriculture.

I asked the Secretary of Agriculture about this in December, 1930, and on December 19 he wrote me as follows:

> From the information available I am convinced there has been gross exaggeration as to the losses.

That may be, but we want to determine whether there has been exaggeration.

> Compensation should be limited to the destruction in the early days of the campaign of certain fruits and vegetables which were doubtful hosts of the fruit fly.

In other words, they admit liability, they admit there is some responsibility for the losses; but the Secretary said that—

> Compensation should be limited to the destruction in the early days of the campaign.

All right; but let us know what that means. Let us find out what the destruction was and where it was and under what circumstances. Perhaps we can agree upon a basis for settling the claims. But we do not get anywhere by merely saying there are certain losses that will not be paid and certain that will be paid. We must consider the claims and survey the situation and get the facts before Congress.

The Secretary admits in this letter to me that there were losses, that there was destruction of fruits and vegetables, and says that he is not informed as to what they may amount to, continuing:

> I think it should be limited to cases of actual destruction.

All right, let us so limit it; but let us find out what the facts are. What was the destruction?

> Accurate estimate of the actual losses sustained is not available and can not be obtained by any means short of a careful review by an impartial board of claims which may be submitted.

That is what we are asking for now, a review by an impartial board of the claims that may be submitted.

As has been mentioned in answer to some inquiry submitted to my colleague, there was a voluntary committee created in Florida. The chairman of that committee owns some 15,000 or 20,000 acres of citrus groves. Of course, he is vitally interested in the matter. He was the chairman of this voluntary committee composed of public-spirited men who served without any pay and who made a pretty careful study of the whole situation over the State. They submitted their report to the Secretary of Agriculture. There were 16 members of that committee, very intelligent, capable, conscientious people. But the Secretary said in his letter to me:

> Accurate estimate of the actual losses sustained is not available and can not be obtained by any means short of a careful review by an impartial board of claims which may be submitted.

We can say here are the claims already submitted to this committee. Others may be presented. Opportunity should be given all parties concerned. Review them by an impartial board if you insist upon it. Here is the board provided to be set up in the amendment which my colleague has offered. That meets with the requirements of the Department of Agriculture.

We are trying to conform to the views of the department. They suggested that we wait about the appropriation until we finish the job. We waited. They raised the quarantine on November 16, 1930. They said they had eradicated the fly, and I am glad they did. That was a great piece of work. I think they did marvelously well in many instances, and I commend them for it. But that work is finished. Out of this operation and the eradication of the fly there have followed certain losses. Some people lost everything they had. If a grove was infested there is no claim for the loss suffered by that grower. He does not pretend to present any claim. His fruit had to be destroyed and his trees sprayed. If fruit was destroyed miles and miles away from any infestation, that is another question. If vegetables were destroyed that never were infested at any time during the history of this performance, if they refused to allow people to ship their fruit and vegetables and required them to destroy them, that is another question.

This was done not merely for the protection of Florida but for the protection of the whole country. Quarantine regulations were set up and the markets were limited. Finally the department allowed fruit and vegetables to move north of Potomac Yards and thus kept them out of the South. Later on they kept removing the restrictions and after a while allowed vegetables to move, although then the crop was practically gone. They were doing the best they could, I admit, but they unnecessarily caused great losses because the whole experience demonstrated to every one of them that there were never any flies in peppers and vegetables of that kind. They went out into the wilds and selected what they called "possible hosts" there in such things as cherries. They eliminated certain fruits from the market just on suspicion. They even went further than that and actually cut down trees, which was not necessary at all. They ought to pay for that loss to our people.

A few years ago we had in Florida what was called the citrus canker. That was a dread disease. The Department of Agriculture cooperated with our plant board and whole groves were destroyed; not only the fruit was destroyed but the trees were burned. Nobody got any compensation there in that case. But in this case the Department of Agriculture very properly assumed direction and control. It was a joint operation, if you please, in connection with the State plant board. The State plant board conformed to their requirements throughout, and the Department of Agriculture was the head in front of the whole matter. What we want now is to set up the machinery which they require, namely, a board to review the claims that may be submitted, to make a survey, and to report back to the Secretary of Agriculture, who in turn will report to Congress, and upon that report we can deal with the question of compensation.

I submit that the Senate ought to permit us to save this time. Action on the pending amendment will mean a great saving of time. If we do not adopt it now, we will have to go on with a bill, hold hearings, obtain a report, and it will take a great deal more time to consider the bill and have it passed, just as was the case a year ago. The action now proposed is simply, in effect, that which was taken a year ago. The measure then adopted could not get through the House at that time and died without action. We ask the Senate now to let us save this time, to let us set up this board which the department asks for, without any additional expense or appropriation, using a part of the fund the department already has up to the amount provided by the amendment, so that a report may be made. That is the foundation upon which the department insists, and we simply ask that its wishes be complied with now.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, one of the objections to the item proposed by the two Senators from Florida is that such record as there is in connection with it is an unfavorable one. The item is not submitted by the Department of Agriculture to the Bureau of the Budget; it was not brought to the attention of the Appropriations Committee of the House or the Appropriations Committee of the Senate. The matter comes here on the floor of the Senate as an entirely new proposition, without an opportunity ever having been given to the committee to hold hearings or to consider it.

As stated by the Senator from Florida, a bill similar in character to the amendment did pass the Senate last year, and a bill parallel in terms to the pending proposal is now before the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. It occurs to me that the question should come up through the medium of an authorization bill, after hearings are had in the usual way. If then it should be passed by this body, an item could be attached to some deficiency bill before the end of the present session of Congress.

I suggested that course to the Senator from Florida a few days ago, and I think now he should take that course. If he will do so, believing it a wise course from his standpoint, and believing it would be fair to the department and fair to Congress to have hearings held before the amendment is attempted to be placed on an appropriation bill, I will promise at a very early date to have the committee consider the subject, and if a majority should determine that the bill should come to the attention of the Senate I shall be very glad to make a favorable report.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. That would only mean further delay. This is not an intricate proposition; it is a matter which we thoroughly understand; it has once been before the committee, and has once been passed upon by the Senate. There has been no change in the facts or the conditions or the situation, except that the Secretary of Agriculture has reversed his position. I am not in favor of allowing him to hold up legislation. If he is going to hold up legislation, then I will have to try to hold up some legislation that he wishes. It is nothing but a matter of prejudice on his part in not wanting the situation investigated.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator has made his position clear, and I refuse further to yield.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon declines to yield further.

Mr. TRAMMELL. If the Senator will pardon me, in regard to his statement that the matter is now before the committee, let me say it has been there now for a couple of months. The Senator has not indulged in any dilatory tactics, but he has been very busy. I have talked to him three or four times about having the bill considered by the committee, but he said that the committee had particular legislation for the following day and that probably on the ensuing Tuesday I might be able to get a hearing. At that time, however, the committee was engaged in a hearing on the Muscle Shoals question. The Senator is always very courteous; I appreciate that; but I do not see any reason why this matter should again be delayed, when it is fairly plain and involves a subject which is well understood, and when we are dealing with the agricultural appropriation bill. So I hope the Senator will not insist on further delay and having this matter carried over to another session of Congress.

Mr. McNARY. It is not a question of delay; there is a very large principle involved. The Senator did speak to me about the bill pending before the committee. I told him that my time was occupied with other matters, but I would give him a hearing as soon as I had a report from the Department of Agriculture. It is only within recent days the department has reported—and the report is adverse—so I am in a position now to call the committee together to consider the proposition.

Let me state not my own view but the department's view of this matter. I have not had an opportunity to form an individual and independent view, because the matter was presented here only yesterday, but there have been about $7,000,000 expended by the National Government in an effort to eradicate and control the Mediterranean fruit fly which was infesting groves and doing injury to citrus fruits and vegetables in Florida. It does not matter, it is quite beside the question, how many were discovered or the extent of the infestation; the State of Florida was glad and the growers were happy, indeed, to have the Government come there and undertake to destroy the infested fruit and vegetables. In that work the Government expended about $7,000,000.

Mr. FLETCHER. It was something less than that.

Mr. McNARY. I said "about $7,000,000."

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator is substantially correct. It is stated in a document before me—

> Federal funds expended in the Federal program exceed $6,000,000.

Mr. McNARY. I have the statement fresh from the Department of Agriculture that the actual amount expended by the Government was $6,710,411. I said "about $7,000,000." I think that I am not extravagant in that statement.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. KING. Merely for information, let me inquire was that amount expended in Florida?

Mr. McNARY. That amount was expended in Florida.

Mr. KING. In connection with the eradication of the Mediterranean fruit fly?

Mr. McNARY. In connection with the attempt to eradicate and control the Mediterranean fruit fly.

Mr. President, much of this expenditure for the eradication of the fruit fly was devoted to the purpose of preventing infestation and a spread of the pest to other States; and by reason of the expenditure of that money great quantities of citrus fruit and vegetables continued to be shipped out of Florida into markets which would have been foreclosed if the strong arm of the Government had not reached into Florida. That is one item of benefit that the State of Florida received from the expenditure of public funds.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Is that not equally true when a quarantine is placed upon cattle infected with the foot-and-mouth disease, and in that situation does not the Government reimburse the owners? Does not this bill carry an appropriation for cases of that character? I suggest to the Senator that he consider that proposition.

Mr. McNARY. Quite a different proposition is involved in that case, as must be obvious to the Senator. Mr. President, in the case cited by the able Senator from Florida, and in the case involving appropriations in connection with the eradication of bovine tuberculosis, the individual, the State, and the Government all absorb the losses. There is no proposal here for Florida or the growers to absorb and share any of its responsibility or loss.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, the pending proposition does not propose any adjustment of losses.

Mr. McNARY. I appreciate that, but in all the statements made by the two very able and distinguished Senators from Florida not a word has been said about local responsibility—the owners' responsibility or the State's responsibility.

Mr. FLETCHER. If the Senator will allow me, I said in my remarks that the department has claimed all along that the State or local contributions should amount to 50 per cent of the loss.

Mr. McNARY. That is true.

Mr. FLETCHER. That claim is made, and I do not deny it.

Mr. McNARY. That is true.

Mr. FLETCHER. But I let that go for what it is worth; that is a matter we are not dealing with here. We are asking for a survey to ascertain what losses were incurred. When they shall have been ascertained, we will determine what elements shall enter into the matter, what factors shall be considered in fixing the loss, and then as to how the loss shall be reimbursed.

Mr. McNARY. I appreciate that, but the Senator himself in a very able speech referred to the merits of the controversy as to the liability of the Federal Government. I am simply taking up the threads of his argument and attempting to demonstrate that the State of Florida and also the growers have some responsibility in this connection, and also to show that some benefit accrued to the State and to the growers, which are items which can not wholly be forgotten in the discussion of the problem.

Mr. FLETCHER. I concede that.

Mr. McNARY. The attitude of the Department of Agriculture in opposition to this proposal is simply that its adoption might leave an implication of Federal responsibility in connection with this damage. I think it is fair for me to make that statement, because that is the basis of the Government's opposition, as expressed by the Department of Agriculture. Without a hearing upon this subject, it being presented for the first time on the floor of the Senate, I repeat that, in my opinion, the method now proposed is not the best way to legislate in this body. If the Senators from Florida will pursue the course which they pursued heretofore, and bring the matter to the attention of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, I can assure them very prompt consideration.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I inquire of the Senator whether he means to say that the department denies all responsibility or all liability on the part of the Government? Is that its attitude now? I never understood it to be so.

Mr. McNARY. The department is making no such proposition nor am I attempting to quote the department in that fashion. I am saying that the department believes that the language of this proposal does leave the implication of Federal responsibility, which it is not willing to admit. But, in any event, that is not for the department to determine; that is a legislative matter which falls within the purview of the Senate and the House of Representatives.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think that is so.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the junior Senator from Florida?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I wish to state to the Senator from Oregon, the distinguished chairman of the committee, that the amendment offered by me specifically provides on page 2, in line 19:

> That such report and finding shall serve as information only for consideration and not be binding on the Secretary of Agriculture or Congress.

That puts everybody on notice that it is merely an inquiry, merely a survey.

Mr. McNARY. I am familiar with that language, and, as I think the Senator will understand, I am not making an assertion of language that is not in the proposal. I am trying to make clear the attitude of the department, which believes that the amendment, read from first to last, leaves the implication of Federal responsibility.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield further to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Has the Senator any explanation from the Secretary of Agriculture why a year and a half ago he approved the proposition and then said that it would not be objectionable, and now he has changed his attitude? I should like to know what the explanation is for the change of his attitude, if any can be given.

Mr. McNARY. I do not believe myself capable of speaking or that I possess sufficient information to speak for the Secretary of Agriculture; I am not familiar with what he said a year and a half ago; but I know what he says now; of that I am quite certain.

Aside from the merits of this controversy, I suggest that it would not be good practice to adopt proposed legislation of this kind at this time in the consideration of a supply bill. The two Senators well know the item is subject to a point of order, and a confession of that situation was made when they gave notice of a motion to suspend the rule. That brings the matter here largely on its merits, without any standing or select committee of the Senate being given an opportunity to make a thorough study of the principles involved. That is my particular objection. I am not here to argue—and I do not want the Senator to understand that I claim—that there is no Federal liability. I have no judgment on that subject; I am not sufficiently familiar with the facts to have one. It may be the Federal Government should in some way compensate the growers; but I know if that is to be done it must be done after an exhaustive study of the situation. I know, as an offset to any losses the growers suffered in Florida, great benefits inured to them by reason of the Government permitting, after inspection and investigation, the shipment of fruit which otherwise would have been held within the State of Florida.

Mr. President, I regret the necessity of opposing as heartily as I do this proposition because of the lack of record, or the unfavorable record, I may say, the item has as it comes to us here; secondly, I do not like the procedure, because it collides with the rules of the Senate; and thirdly, a matter so important as this should receive the careful study of some committee. So I ask the Senators from Florida to reconsider their proposal, and let it be considered and studied in the usual fashion before the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. President, as a part of my remarks, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture regarding this matter. It might be well to have it read at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the letter will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, January 12, 1932.

Hon. CHARLES L. MCNARY,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR MCNARY: I have for acknowledgment your letter of December 14 transmitting for my consideration and advice a copy of Senate bill 266, introduced by Senator TRAMMELL, to provide for an investigation and report of losses resulting from the campaign for the eradication of the Mediterranean fruit fly. After careful consideration I must advise you that I disapprove the bill.

In setting up a Federal board to conduct a complete investigation and survey of all losses sustained by growers and farmers in the State of Florida resulting from the campaign to eradicate the Mediterranean fruit fly in that State, Senate bill 266, in a measure at least, acknowledges Federal responsibility for all losses that may have occurred in the fruit-fly work in Florida. This responsibility can not be accepted, as the State of Florida is at least equally liable with the Federal Government for any products destroyed, since nothing was destroyed except under State authority.

Further, the bill apparently does not exclude recognition of any kind of loss, either tangible or intangible, sustained by any farmer or fruit grower during the period when Mediterranean fruit fly work was in progress, whether directly attributable to this work or not.

The presumption must be, further, that if a Federal board makes an investigation and survey of all losses sustained by growers and farmers in the State of Florida resulting from the campaign to eradicate the Mediterranean fruit fly in that State, any losses determined upon as having resulted from such campaign will be compensated for by the Federal Treasury.

Without acknowledging any Federal obligation to reimburse Florida farmers and fruit growers for losses sustained in the Mediterranean fruit fly eradication campaign, it is my belief that compensation should not extend in any case beyond losses which may have resulted from the destruction of uninfested fruits and vegetables or products not exposed to infestation.

Having in mind the natural assumption which would follow the passage of this bill, that in creating a Federal board to survey all losses the Federal Government recognizes the obligation to reimburse those who incurred such losses, it seems desirable to point out that the Federal Government has in no instance departed from the principle that the State and the people concerned should contribute equally with the Federal Government in compensating for losses sustained. In no case has the Federal Government paid more than 50 per cent of the losses sustained, and then only when the State has actually paid a like amount.

It should be remembered in this connection that in the Mediterranean fruit fly eradication campaign in Florida the United States Government spent $6,710,411, while the State of Florida expended $378,768.68. A large amount of this Federal expenditure was devoted to keeping the markets of the country open for Florida products through inspection, supervisions of treatment where necessary, and that type of certification which guaranteed acceptance of the products at destination. This Florida could not have done without the aid of the Federal Government. The economic benefits of this work to Florida citrus growers were much greater than the damage done.

Finally, no board could undertake to make the survey contemplated by Senate bill 266 in the time indicated in the bill. At least six months would be required to make the survey contemplated and report to the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Secretary of Agriculture should not be required to report to Congress before next session.

Sincerely yours,

ARTHUR M. HYDE, Secretary.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, if this were an entirely new proposition, if it were an intricate problem, if it involved the question of the element of damages that would be considered by Congress later on, if it had not already once been before the committee and received the approval of the committee without the objection of the Secretary of Agriculture and passed the Senate, then we might think it was a matter of such a nature and such seriousness that it would have to have the serious deliberation of a committee upon it.

However, the proposal has passed a committee. It has passed the Senate. It was redrafted to suit the Secretary of Agriculture so as not to incur his objection when it was before the committee in February, 1931, and there is no change in the situation except a flopping over on the proposition on the part of the Secretary of Agriculture. We expect, of course, that we will naturally have his opposition to an investigation.

As I have already stated, a resolution can be introduced in this body with some preambles asserting some rumors in regard to a situation and in 10 minutes we will pass a resolution here providing for an investigation that will cost twenty-five or fifty thousand dollars. We have a situation in Florida where a great many of our American citizens, growers and farmers, feel that they have suffered an unjust damage. All we are asking is that the Secretary of Agriculture appoint 5 people, 2 of whom shall be of his department, 2 citizens of Florida, and 1 citizen at large, the independent members of the board getting only $10 a day, to investigate the situation and see whether these people were damaged or not damaged, collect claims, and submit them to the Secretary of Agriculture, who is then to make a report to Congress.

That is all this amendment means; and we propose to ask that $25,000 of the fund that is now available for the Mediterranean fruit fly situation shall be used for the purpose of carrying on the inquiry. That is all this is; and it is not a new proposition.

I have seen matters come up here on questions of suspension of the rules heretofore that were much more complicated and difficult of comprehension on just a few moments' notice or two or three days' notice. I think every Senator thoroughly understands this matter; and action on it has been so long delayed that my colleague and I would appreciate it very much if the Senate would allow us to place this amendment on the bill and at least have it considered by the conference committee.

I am not going into the question of the merits of the damage or the merits of our situation compared with others throughout the country.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the junior Senator from Florida yield to his colleague?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I do.

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to say, because I do not know that I made it plain previously, that under the act of 1931 a certain amount was appropriated to carry on this fruit-fly work. There is a balance left over in that fund, already appropriated under the act of 1931, which will lapse into the Treasury on June 30 of this year. My colleague proposes that out of that fund, unappropriated and unused—not a new appropriation at all—there shall be set aside and used $25,000 for this investigation. If that is not done the money will simply go back into the Treasury.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the junior Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. KING. I desire to ask a question of both Senators, and I do not care which one answers it. The question is whether or not this amendment which is tendered under the proposed suspension of the rules implies liability upon the part of the Government to make payment. Does it concede that the Government was derelict in such a way as that liability attaches for which compensation should be paid; or does it merely provide for an inquiry to determine all the facts, from which it might be determined whether there is liability upon the part of the Government, and—if that should be decided affirmatively—the amount of damage which has been sustained by individuals?

Mr. TRAMMELL. The amendment carries with it no legal obligation on the part of the Government, and I do not think it even carries with it a moral obligation, because the amendment specifically provides, and therefore puts all claimants on notice—that such report and finding shall serve as information only for consideration and not be binding on the Secretary of Agriculture or Congress.

If that does not put the claimants on notice that the element of reimbursement, the legislative question that would apply to that matter, is to come up later, and that this does not bind the Secretary or Congress, I do not know how much plainer it can be made. The amendment specifically says that it is not to be binding.

I am not going into the question of the treatment that has been extended on the matter of policy of reimbursement in other instances and in other States further than to say that the bill that is now pending carries appropriations of millions of dollars for the reimbursement of other people who have been similarly damaged on account of some unpreventable disease or pest affecting their property. That, however, is a matter to be discussed when the legislative question comes up later before Congress, if it does come up before Congress.

Senators may talk about the benefits to the State. They may say, "We will not compensate anybody out in the West when a herd of cattle is stricken with the foot-and-mouth disease; we will not reimburse them at all, because that is a benefit to the people engaged in the cattle industry in the rest of the country." It is; yet that character of argument, incidentally, seems to be applied by my friend with regard to Florida. "Because they were benefited, we do not know whether they ought to be paid anything or not."

We reimburse people for the destruction of tubercular cattle. We might say, "Oh, that poor, unfortunate man should not be reimbursed in any way. The Federal Government should not pay him 50 per cent of the value," as it does under this bill, "because that was for the good of the industry, the good of the cattle people of the country. Let him bear his entire loss."

That is not the policy that has been pursued in the rest of the country in dealing with agricultural interests or with the cattle interests in different sections of America. All we ask is that when we come to the question of considering the merits of the proposition, Florida shall be treated fairly and justly, just as the people of all other parts of our country have been treated.

This amendment is merely asking for a survey. It will expedite the matter somewhat; it will hurt nobody and will do a little piece of justice, as I think, to the people of Florida.

I hope the Senate will see fit to allow us to place this amendment on the bill and not have the matter tied up and delayed. We have been delayed more than two years since we began seeking relief. Do not defeat this amendment and probably delay us to a point where we will have to wait for another session of Congress to seek the same identical relief. We would appreciate the generosity of the Senate in allowing us to attach the amendment to this bill. It is an agricultural subject. It is germane, according to many other provisions of the bill. The other features of the bill deal with rather similar propositions; and we should greatly appreciate it if we could have the amendment attached to this bill, at least for consideration by the conference committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] to suspend the rules. Let the motion be read, as the yeas and nays will be required.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Pursuant to the provisions of Rule XL of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby give notice in writing that I shall hereafter move to suspend paragraphs 1 and 4 of Rule XVI for the purpose of proposing to the bill (H. R. 7912) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, the following amendment, viz: On page 94, after line 2, insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 3. That a board is hereby created, to be known as the Mediterranean Fruit-Fly Board, to be composed of five persons, to be appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture, two of whom shall be representatives of the Department of Agriculture (one to be chairman of the board), two citizens of the State of Florida, and one man at large. Any vacancy occurring in the board shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointment. Each member of the board, other than members holding office under the Federal Government, shall receive compensation at the rate of $10 per day while actually employed on the business of the board. The board shall cease to exist upon transmitting its report as herein provided.

The board is authorized and directed to (1) conduct a complete investigation and survey of actual losses sustained by growers and farmers in the State of Florida resulting directly from the campaign to eradicate the Mediterranean fruit fly in such State; (2) receive claims for actual losses sustained by such persons in the State of Florida by reason of direct damage resulting from such campaign, supported by such proof as the board by regulation may prescribe; (3) report the facts and make findings upon such claims as to the amount of actual loss sustained; and (4) transmit to the Secretary of Agriculture not later than 90 days after the approval of this act a report of the survey and its findings in respect of claims for such losses: Provided, That such report and finding shall serve as information only for consideration and not be binding on the Secretary of Agriculture or Congress. The Secretary of Agriculture shall, within 30 days after receiving such report, or if Congress is not in session, then at the beginning of the December, 1932, session of Congress, transmit such report of survey to Congress, together with such recommendations as he may, in his judgment, deem advisable.

The regular employees of the Department of Agriculture shall be used as far as possible, but the board may, with the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, appoint in addition thereto and fix the compensation (without regard to the civil service laws and regulations or to the classification act of 1923, as amended) of such other employees as may be necessary, and may, with the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, make such expenditures, including expenditures for travel and subsistence expenses for personal services at the seat of government and elsewhere, and for printing and binding as are necessary for the efficient execution of its functions under this section. All expenses of the board shall be allowed and paid upon the presentation of itemized vouchers therefor approved by the chairman of the board and the Secretary of Agriculture.

That there is hereby appropriated the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this section.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, at an appropriate time I will offer an amendment so as to modify the provision relative to the fund for carrying out the purpose of this section, to strike out the part making a direct appropriation, and provide for making available $25,000 of the Mediterranean fly fund heretofore appropriated, so that it will not carry a new appropriation. I note that the policy under the agricultural appropriation bill we are considering is to transfer some money out of that fund to some other fund. So I shall propose a little later, when I have opportunity, to have $25,000 made available from an existing appropriation.

The resolution specifically provides that this information shall not bind the Congress or the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture dated December 19, 1930.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D. C., December 19, 1930.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR: Your letter of November 26, in which you present the matter of compensating fruit and vegetable growers in Florida for losses which may have been occasioned by the work carried on to eradicate the Mediterranean fruit fly, has been received. I note your desire to discuss this matter with me. I shall be glad to discuss this matter with you at any time it may be convenient to both of us.

Very careful consideration has been given to the question of compensating fruit and vegetable growers for losses which they may have sustained in connection with the eradication work on the Mediterranean fruit fly, and representatives of the department have gathered certain information as to such losses. From the information available, I am convinced that there has been gross exaggeration as to losses. Compensation should be limited to the destruction, in the early days of the campaign, of certain fruits and vegetables which were doubtful hosts of the fruit fly.

You, of course, appreciate that any work in the eradication of the Mediterranean fruit fly which led to the destruction of property was done under State authority. In the eradication of this pest the State of Florida received the greatest benefit and should, therefore, bear the greatest portion of any compensation which may be paid. If compensation is, as I think it should be, limited to cases of actual destruction, the amount of compensation would be small. In no event should the principle of 50 per cent contribution by the State or State agencies be waived; indeed, since Federal funds expended in the program exceeded $6,000,000 and State funds fell short of $400,000, serious consideration should be given to the question whether, as a matter of equity, compensation to growers should not be borne entirely by the State of Florida. Accurate estimate of the actual losses sustained is not available and can not be obtained by any means short of a careful review, by an impartial board, of claims which may be submitted.

Sincerely,

ARTHUR W. HYDE, Secretary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On this question the yeas are 33 and the nays are 34. Two-thirds of the Senators present not having voted for a suspension of the rule, the motion is lost.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. MOSES. Are we now in the stage of individual amendments?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that that is the situation.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I do not so understand it. We passed over a committee amendment yesterday to be taken up to-day. I am going to ask that we dispose of that under the unanimous-consent agreement which was granted at the inception of the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator object to taking up individual amendments at this time?

Mr. McNARY. I do.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator from Oregon that I have to attend a meeting of the Committee on Banking and Currency and probably before that meeting is concluded the bill will be disposed of. I spoke to the Senator yesterday about the amendment and he said it would be satisfactory to him for me to offer it to-day. Otherwise I should have offered it yesterday. Under these circumstances I do not want to be cut off from the right to offer my amendment. The meeting of the Banking and Currency Committee is proceeding now and it is quite necessary that I should attend it. I have been waiting all afternoon until the matter of the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] was disposed of in order that I might offer the amendment. I do not think it will take any time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon object?

Mr. McNARY. I shall try to accommodate the Senator if it does not require any debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky offers the following amendment, which will be stated.

Provided, That hereafter in the administration of the Federal highway act and acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto, the first paragraph of section 9 of the act of November 9, 1921, shall not apply to publicly owned toll bridges or approaches thereto, constructed and operated by the highway department of any State.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, under section 9 of the act of 1921 and under section 1 of the first Federal highway act, all roads in the construction and operation of which Federal aid is involved must be free of toll. The object of the provision was to make sure that the Government of the United States did not contribute money to the building of roads or bridges operated by private concerns or individuals for which a toll was charged.

Some of the States are now building their own bridges under laws enacted by the legislatures authorizing the collection of tolls and providing that as soon as a bridge has been paid for out of the tolls it shall become free. Under regulations of the Bureau of Public Roads, Department of Agriculture, operating under that section it will not contribute anything toward the construction of a highway within 6 miles of a private toll bridge or any other sort of toll bridge. That means that the State highway commission of my State, for instance, which is now engaged in the building of public bridges out of public money, for which they are to charge tolls until the bridge is paid for out of the tolls, can not receive any contribution in the form of Federal aid.

Under this law the Bureau of Public Roads will not contribute any money to build even the approaches within 6 miles of these publicly owned toll bridges. I have a letter from Mr. MacDonald, Chief of the Bureau of Public Roads, in which he advocates the lifting of that inhibition so far as publicly owned toll bridges are concerned. I have conferred with him in the preparation of the amendment and it meets with the approval of the Bureau of Public Roads here in Washington. I hope it will be adopted. It simply means that the publicly owned bridges shall be left out of this inhibition, which was never intended to cover them.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, this proposal would very substantially modify existing law with respect to Federal-aid roads. A proposal of this kind should be submitted to the committee having jurisdiction over such legislative matters, which is the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads of the Senate. This being purely a Department of Agriculture appropriation bill and the proposed amendment being legislation that vitally affects and changes existing law, I believe it is my duty, as the Senator in charge of the bill, to invoke the rule.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I have a letter from Mr. MacDonald which I should like to have read as bearing upon the matter.

Mr. McNARY. I have great admiration for Mr. MacDonald, but his views would probably not modify my own.

Mr. BARKLEY. That might be.

Mr. McNARY. Of course, I have no objection to the Senator having a proper committee at an appropriate time consider the legislation, but Mr. MacDonald is not in charge of the pending appropriation bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understand that, and I am not intimating that anyone is in charge of it except the able and distinguished Senator from Oregon. If anyone should make the charge that anybody else is in charge of it, I would deny it most vehemently. There is no effort to take away from the Senator from Oregon any jurisdiction in the matter whatever. But the Senator knows that the chances are that unless the amendment is added to the pending appropriation bill it may not be possible to secure the legislation at this session. The State highway commission in my State is now engaged in the project of constructing, in cooperation with the Bureau of Public Roads here, a highway which involves and includes two publicly owned toll bridges.

Under regulations which have been adopted by the Bureau of Public Roads in the Department of Agriculture, they can not do otherwise than insist upon their enforcement unless there is such an amendment permitting the Federal Government to participate with the State Highway Commission of Kentucky in the building of these Federal highway projects, which cross the Cumberland River and the Tennessee River, over which the State highway commission has just completed two bridges at a combined expense of nearly $1,000,000, in which we had no Federal aid. But we do think the Federal Government ought to be able and willing to help build the road up to the bridges so the State highway commission may go ahead with its work, because otherwise the chances are the work will have to be stopped. It is for that reason that I am urging the matter at this time. Otherwise it would be entirely satisfactory to take the course suggested by the Senator from Oregon.

If there is any further step necessary and if the Senator from Oregon desires to make any further representations to the conferees, as he will be a member of the conferees on the part of the Senate when the bill goes to conference, I shall be glad to cooperate with him in any way to safeguard the interests of the Federal Government in the matter.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I experience this difficulty. Congress has always legislated against the encouragement and increase of toll bridges.

Mr. BARKLEY. Private toll bridges.

Mr. McNARY. Please let me conclude my statement. Congress has expressed itself many, many times in opposition to the increase of private toll bridges. Here the Senator from Kentucky comes with a proposal to take out of this inhibition bridges which are owned by adjoining counties or municipalities or by the State—publicly owned bridges, in other words.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have no reference to any county bridges or city bridge or bridges built jointly by counties. In applies only to bridges being constructed by the State highway department out of State funds.

Mr. McNARY. Very well; we will call them public bridges. They certainly have that attribute.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. A matter of this kind is important. It is important that we should determine whether we shall adopt such a modified policy or not. Congress has never had an opportunity to express itself in a legislative way. We should not rely upon the opinion of one individual in a matter so important as this, high in authority though he may be, but it ought to be brought to the attention of some standing committee of the Senate which has jurisdiction to legislate. The matter should be gone into carefully by a committee, and not proposed in the form of an amendment to an appropriation bill when it has never received the attention of the Budget committee or of the House or of the Senate. Consequently, and in view of that situation and my presently known attitude, I must invoke the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is sustained. Under the unanimous-consent agreement, the Senate automatically resumes consideration of the so-called convict labor amendment, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 65, lines 13, 14, 15, and 16, the committee proposes to strike out the following language:

Provided, That none of the money herein appropriated shall be paid to any State on account of any project on which convict labor shall be directly employed.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] offers the following amendment to the House text proposed to be stricken out by the committee:

On page 65, line 16, after the word "employed" and before the period, insert a comma and the following words:

Except that provision shall not apply to convict labor performed by convicts on parole or probation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] to the House text.

Mr. NEELY obtained the floor.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator from West Virginia yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. NEELY. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I am satisfied from conference with the Senator that he is about to discuss some amendments which would have been offered. Is the Senator going to discuss the pending amendment to the committee amendment?

Mr. NEELY. No; I do not propose to discuss the pending amendment to the committee amendment. I was about to read a speech prepared by the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR].

Mr. McNARY. Will not the Senator, as a matter of accommodation—it will be very helpful—permit us to dispose of the amendment now pending and the committee amendment? Then the Senator can read the speech of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. NEELY. Certainly I will do that. It is immaterial to me when I shall read the speech.

Mr. McNARY. I shall be very much delighted if the Senator will grant my request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] to the House text, which the committee report to strike out.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I note from the RECORD that the vote on this particular committee amendment was deferred on account of my necessary absence from the Chamber yesterday. I do not think that I can more lucidly or impressively state the case than has already been done by the distinguished chairman of the committee and by other Senators; but inasmuch as my own State is especially concerned, I desire to say very briefly that no State in the Union has more stringent statutory regulations than has Virginia against the employment of convict labor in competition with free labor.

As a matter of fact, the convicts of the State of Virginia within the penitentiary are permitted to work on nothing of a competitive nature except the manufacture of automobile license tags. Aside from that the convicts are employed on the State experimental farm and on the State roads. I may say also incidentally that no State in the Union, in my opinion, has a more alert or enterprising or more reasonable labor department than has Virginia. It is, indeed, significant that I have not received a letter from a labor organization in that State or from a single individual protesting against the elimination of this incidental House provision from the bill as reported to the Senate. That is because it has been ascertained that there is practically no discrimination against free labor involved in the proposal to eliminate this provision of the bill. It has been computed that at the very most it would involve the expenditure of only 5 cents per day per convict. If the House provision shall prevail, it is my view that it will be distinctively a discrimination against free labor.

Aside from the humanitarian view, from that view which experts insist necessitates some employment for prisoners who are incarcerated, the laboring people of Virginia, as of all other States, are taxed to maintain these State institutions, and the likelihood is that the increased exaction upon the substance of free labor in Virginia will be greater if the House provision should prevail than the deprivation or the alleged discrimination against free labor involved in the report of the Senate committee.

I feel very confident of my position, because the labor organizations of my State, and particularly the bureau of labor, presided over by a laboring man of exceptional intelligence and activity in behalf of his class, I am sure would have protested if they could conceive that there is any discrimination here against free labor. Only $141 out of every $1,000 are expended for common labor under appropriations of this kind, the other expenditures being for a higher class of labor.

Moreover, Mr. President, I may briefly remark that I think there is a great delusion as well as an infinite injustice in most of the proposals for so-called Federal aid to the States. Whence does the United States Treasury derive its revenue? Most uninformed people think that all the Government has to do is to start its printing presses and hand out money for public purposes. As a matter of fact, not a dollar in the Federal Treasury is derived from any other source than from the pockets of the taxpayers of the country, and frequently so-called Federal aid simply means taking funds in excessive amounts from the taxpayers of the various States, impounding them in the Federal Treasury, and eking them out, doling them back to the States under restrictions that Congress may, whimsically or otherwise, be pleased to employ.

If the House provision shall prevail it will involve a large expenditure upon my State. The superintendent of the State prison and the highway commissioner estimate that it will be necessary to double the capacity of the State penitentiary and keep the prisoners unoccupied at the expense of free labor, which must be taxed to maintain the penal institutions and to maintain the prisoners in idleness. It is inhumane; it is something that has been opposed by those experts, those benevolent people whose business it is to study all phases of this question.

To show in a moment the injustice of this so-called Federal aid to States, I desire to say that my State contributed last year in direct taxes to the Federal Treasury $114,000,000, or nearly 5 per cent of the total internal-revenue collections of the National Government. It received back in these doles to be distributed by Federal means an inconsequential sum of money. I recall several States—I will not be invidious—whose contributions to the Federal Treasury range from 0.07 to 0.09 per cent of the total revenue that are now receiving for road purposes alone a million dollars more than is received by Virginia. I have evidence here of States each contributing less than half a million dollars to the Federal Treasury that are getting more money for road purposes than Virginia despite the $114,000,000 which she supplied to the Federal Treasury.

Federal aid is a misnomer; it is a miserable delusion. If the Government would leave one tithe of the $114,000,000 that Virginia pays into the Federal Treasury in her own treasury or give her general assembly the opportunity to assess taxation against her own citizens and keep the money there, Virginia would not want any Federal aid to good roads or good anything else; she could maintain herself.

Virginia can employ her unemployed without any Federal aid as well as take care of her indigents. Whenever my State gets in the position that it can not take care and will not take care of its indigents, I should like for it to get somebody else to represent the State here in the United States Senate, I would be so infinitely ashamed of her.

On this matter States that confessedly have no interest whatsoever, because they do not so employ their prisoners, are undertaking to make regulations that no part of this Federal aid may be used in my State, with its 5 per cent of the total internal-revenue contributions. They are undertaking to regulate the matter. If it needs any regulation, the General Assembly of Virginia is now in session. If there is anyone who thinks the regulations of Virginia are not strict enough, let him appear before the Virginia General Assembly and correct the difficulty. That applies not only to this matter but to other matters that we have considered and that we shall hereafter be called upon to consider—this thing of Federal regulation of funds doled back to the States after first having been there collected.

Mr. President, as I said in the beginning, the chairman of the committee and other Senators in my absence have so cogently and, to me, convincingly presented the matter that I shall not further detain the Senate.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I hope the House provision will be adopted. I see a great distinction between what the State of Virginia or any other State wants to do with its own money and the money that is appropriated out of the Federal Treasury.

After all, it seems to me Congress should have a right to say, and should say, how the money that is appropriated out of the Federal Treasury should be used in any State in this Union where it is spent. I for one am opposed to having Federal money used, particularly in a time of emergency like this, for the purpose of giving work to convicts.

It is all right to sympathize with the convict; but, after all, that man has violated some law of the State or the United States, or he would not be there. On the other hand, there are thousands, yes, millions, of men in this country to-day who are anxious and willing to work, who are unable to obtain employment.

The reason why the Congress of the United States is appropriating money out of the Treasury of the United States to-day to build roads is to give employment not only to laboring men who can not find work but likewise to give employment to farmers in various States of the Union who, by reason of economic conditions for which they were not responsible, are unable to make a living for themselves and their families. For this money that is being appropriated by the Congress to help the unemployed in the country to be used on convicts, whether in the State of Virginia or in the State of Montana or any other State, seems to me an unwise policy on the part of Congress and a bad precedent to set.

There is another appropriation bill, an emergency appropriation bill, that is pending before the Congress of the United States that contains exactly the same provision as this. The Senator from Virginia has pointed out how much money the State of Virginia pays in taxes, and that is true. She does pay 5 per cent; but it should be borne in mind that a large portion of that money undoubtedly comes from cigarettes. The cigarettes are smoked by the people all over the United States; and while it is true that the tax is paid by the manufacturer in Virginia, while that is the place where it is collected by the Federal Government, nevertheless the people all over the United States who smoke cigarettes pay that tax that is collected by the manufacturer and paid into the United States Treasury.

I frequently hear remarks upon the floor of the Senate about some State in the West not paying its just proportion of the taxes, and taking money out of the Federal Treasury to build roads. I should like to call attention, however, to the fact that those States pay their just proportion of the taxes that are collected in some of the Eastern States. Most of them pay their just proportion of the taxes upon cigarettes. They pay their just proportion of the taxes upon tobacco. They pay their just proportion of the taxes upon everything else.

I resent the idea that the Western States are getting a larger proportion of appropriations out of the Federal Treasury than are some of the Eastern States that happen to pay more taxes into the Federal Treasury. If the facts were analyzed carefully, I think it would be found that that is not the case at all.

Of course, if the Congress of the United States wants to appropriate money out of the Treasury and wants to say, "You can use this money for the purpose of giving work to convicts," when there are millions of people throughout the United States who want work, it has a perfect right to do so; but neither the State of Montana nor the State of Virginia nor any other State of this Union has a right to say to Congress, "You should not limit in any way you choose the appropriations that are made from the Treasury of the United States."

Under ordinary circumstances and conditions, I should not particularly object to the omission of this provision; but we are trying to meet an emergency situation in the country. It seems to me that it is the only reason why we should appropriate some of the funds that we are appropriating for emergency purposes. While this particular provision is not an emergency provision, but is one that is ordinarily carried in the bill for post roads, yet the same rule ought to apply in this emergency that applies to emergency appropriations.

In my own State, for instance, some few years ago there was an agitation as to whether or not convicts should work upon the roads. Their employment was opposed by practically all of the labor organizations there, excepting that it was said that they had no objection to the employment of convicts where they did not come in conflict with free labor. Consequently, the convicts were given work, but they were given work upon roads that the State otherwise would not have built. If the State of Virginia or any other State wants to work its convicts upon the roads under those conditions, of course the Congress of the United States has not any right to interfere with that course.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. WHEELER. In just a moment. Congress has a right to say, however, that no part of the money which it is appropriating shall be used for this purpose.

I yield now to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator says that the Federal Government has not right to say to Virginia that she shall not use her convicts on the roads. Is that correct?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does not the Senator realize, though, that when the Federal Government says that none of this Federal money shall be used for employing convict labor, we are not only denying the right to use that money but also the right to use the State money, because the State has to contribute to each one of these Federal highways a proportion of its funds?

Mr. WHEELER. Oh, no. Neither the State of Virginia nor any other State needs to use this particular money unless it wants to. We are only saying, "If you do take this money, you must not employ convicts upon the roads."

Mr. CONNALLY. And we are thereby saying that the State shall not use its own money or its own labor in so far as that contribution goes to Federal highways.

Mr. WHEELER. We are saying, "If you want this Federal money, you can not use any part of the money that is appropriated out of the Treasury of the United States for the purpose of employing convicts. You must give it, in time of emergency, to the people who are unemployed throughout the country, to farmers or other free citizens."

I think it is not only the right but the duty of the Congress to say so. If any of these States are so tender of their convicts, if they want to take care of their convicts, they have a perfect right to go out and work them on other roads where the Federal-aid money is not being used.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I have a great deal of sympathy with what the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] has said; but I should like to remind him that this matter is not nearly so serious as regards the actual payment to free labor as he and others imagine.

The kind of labor that is used upon the roads in four States to which this provisions applies that was put in by the House and is moved to be stricken out by the Senate committee is the very cheapest kind of labor. It is the ordinary labor on the road. The testimony of the Chief of the Bureau of Roads of the Department of Agriculture is that less than 15 per cent of the money spent goes into that form of labor. Out of every $1,000 spent, $141 goes in most of the States, with the exception of the four, for the employment of free labor on the road itself.

That $141 out of $1,000 is not going to be spent to pay prisoners for working on the roads. A very small part of it will go for that purpose. The normal wage of free labor on the roads in those States, I am informed, is between two and three dollars a day. The normal wage which they pay the convicts for that kind of work on those roads is 5 cents a day, in addition to their keep, which the State must pay in any event. The difference does not go into the pockets of the convicts or the pockets of the contractors or the State treasury. It goes to employing more free labor.

I am anxious that the Senator from Montana should understand this argument, because I think the facts have not been sufficiently brought out, and are not fully understood.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The attention of the Senator from Montana is requested by the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BINGHAM. That $141 of every $1,000 that the Senator has been talking about, that 14.1 per cent of this money which he denies the four States the privilege of getting, is really more money to be used for the employment of labor, but not the kind of labor that the convict labor replaces. In other words, more roads are built in the States that use convict labor, is spread over a large group of workingmen the $141, with the exception of the 5 cents per day for the convict labor, is spread over a large group of workingmen who are engaged in the manufacture of cement, in the transportation of cement and other road materials, and in the various operations which go into the building of highways.

The testimony of the Chief of the Bureau of Public Roads before the Senate committee was that between 85 and 90 per cent of this money that we appropriate for Federal aid to roads eventually goes into wages and labor, but of that only a very small percentage is actually used on the roads. Of the $1,000, as I have stated, it is only 14.1 per cent.

This House proviso does not affect the State of Connecticut or the other States of New England or the 44 States that do not use this form of labor. They have provided some other means of keeping their convicts employed, and their securing this Federal aid will not be affected if this proviso is retained, but the four States that do employ that means of using their convicts must shut those men up. They can not possibly find anything for them to do within the next year or two, for which this emergency fund is to be used. It will work a great hardship on those particular convicts, and furthermore it will not enable any great amount of additional employment to go to free labor.

I do not know whether I have succeeded in making the somewhat difficult mathematical problem clear to my friend from Montana or not, but the point I am trying to make, if he will pardon my repeating it, is this: That the $141 out of every $1,000 that is saved by the States using convict labor is, nearly all of it, used to pay free labor in the other branches of labor employed in making the roads, namely, in quarries, in the transportation system, in the manufacture of cement, in the machinery, and so forth, that go into road building. Consequently, the argument which the Senator is making is for a provision which keeps a few thousand convicts in four States in a state of unemployment, and forces them into a condition which those who are interested in prison reform believe to be a very bad one. At the same time it does not give any great amount of additional money to free labor, because the money saved by the use of convict labor is actually employed by those States in the employment of free labor.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I appreciate what the Senator says, and I understood that before the Senator took the floor to explain it at such length. What I want to call the Senator's attention to, for instance, is this particular situation: In my own State there is a drought-stricken area. I appealed to the bureau here in Washington, and also appealed to the State highway commission, to give the farmers out there the work upon the roads, to let them do it, and let the work out in small contracts. That is what I think should be done, as a matter of fact, with this money which we are spending upon these roads. There are thousands of farmers not only in my State but in every State in the Union, I do not care whether it is in Virginia or in Montana, who to-day are suffering because of the depression.

In my own State they happen to be suffering in one end of the State also by reason of the drought. But I have no doubt in the world that there are thousands upon thousands of farmers in this country who would like to take their teams and go out and do some work on these roads, and, according to the figures, I have, it will cost but a trifle more to build them in that way. Those farmers should get the benefit of that work, or the laboring people who are able to work and want work should get the benefit of it. I do not like to have the precedent of the Government of the United States appropriating money out of the Treasury of the United States and letting it be used by convicts.

The Senator says these convicts would have to be shut up. I say that is not so, for the simple reason that I have no doubt that there are roads in places in Connecticut where the State could use the tremendously large convict population they have up there instead of keeping those convicts in jail. We have not any large convict population in Montana and we will not have to double the size of our penitentiaries. But I say that the farmer who is suffering by reason of the economic depression, and that the laboring man who wants to work and to earn a few dollars for his wife and babies, should be given preference over the man who has violated the social laws or committed some crime and has been sent to the penitentiary by reason thereof. We should be more sympathetic in these times, it seems to me, and do more for the man who wants work to make a living for his wife and family than we should do for the man who has committed some crime and is in the penitentiary.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, although the Senator claims to have understood what I was going to say before I said it, he did not even understand what I did say. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHEELER. I knew what the Senator would say before he started out.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator had made up his mind as to what I was going to say before I said it, and therefore he did not listen to what I actually did say.

The point I am trying to make is that the farmers who have teams will be given more employment, because there will be more money to pay them in the States where they use convict labor.

The Senator referred to the State of Connecticut. It has not been the practice for many, many years to employ convicts in the State of Connecticut on roads of any kind. Our convicts are employed in the prisons, in the manner directed by the legislature.

The point I have been trying to make is that it is impossible for the States which do use convicts on their roads to change their method of employment to suit the emergency. In the four States referred to you take away from the convicts their privilege of doing something. It is not a question of using all this money to pay the convicts. In view of the fact that the convicts are paid 5 cents a day, it means that the State is enabled to use nearly 40 times as much of that labeled money, that $141 out of every thousand, in the employment of farmers with teams, in the employment of persons who are bringing dirt, crushed stone, and gravel from quarries, and in the employment of other forms of free labor.

The Senator is arguing as though that $141 out of every $1,000 was to be paid to the convicts, but that is not so. I am not arguing in favor of that. I am arguing in favor of the State's right to determine how their convicts shall be employed. When they decree that they shall labor on the roads, it means that they have more money with which to employ free labor of many men—those who work on the roads with teams, as a farmer might do; those who work on transportation work; those in the manufacture of materials.

For the sake of a pitifully small amount so made available for the common labor on the road you would deprive a State of its right to carry out its own laws or be penalized.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I feel obliged to detain the Senate for about three minutes while I explain my vote on this amendment.

I share in the view expressed by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] as to the sale of State rights in return for Federal appropriations. I feel that way largely as a result of the fact that the States which do not provide the larger part of the Federal revenue have by far the largest voice in the Senate. A system has grown and will continue to grow, without our ability to stop it, by which those States will continue to drain from the Federal Treasury large sums of money under every conceivable pretext, and in order to do that they have sold their independence, they have sold the State rights for which a large part of the United States once went to war. We can not stop that. We may deplore it, but we can not ever change it, as far as I am able to see.

I do not like this business of dictating to the States as to how they shall use their convicts. I do not like the types of legislation we have seen here in the maternity law, by which we tell the States how they shall have babies. I do not like a lot of this Federal interference with local sovereignty, and I think in the long run it heads us for disaster. It is going to make our States the equivalents of departments under the French Government, with a centralized government here in Washington run by bureaucrats, doing for the localities what they ought to do for themselves. I think I am in full sympathy with the Senator from Connecticut and the Senator from Virginia.

The second question is the question of the penologist. Of course, it is wise to keep convicts employed. A man deteriorates in idleness, and a man in a cell with no occupation given him goes to pieces morally and physically very fast.

Then there is a third question, and that is the unemployment of the man outside of the penitentiary. Last summer I had the privilege of going through the State penitentiary at Marquette, Mich., an institution with a population of about a thousand men, 40 per cent of whom were there because they had committed murder. The laws of Michigan do not permit capital punishment. Those men were admirably cared for. The cell blocks were comfortable. They were given every privilege consistent with the fact that they were imprisoned convicts, and, in fact, some 10 per cent of them were allowed to live and eat and sleep outside of the wall of the prison. They were trusties and could be trusted to do that.

The government of Michigan provided for them ample food of good quality. Their beds were good, they had tobacco, they had books, they had their clothing, and only a few of the worst of them were in stripes.

Outside of the walls of that penitentiary where those criminals were living in comfort were hundreds and hundreds of men who had been employed in the iron mines of the Marquette Range, who were unable to get a single day's work and were in desperate straits to provide for themselves and their families, and if they could have gotten anything like the clothing and the housing and the food those criminals were getting they would have considered themselves very lucky.

Whatever I may think about State rights, and whatever I may think about the advantages of keeping incarcerated criminals at work, I can not get over that contrast. If a convict goes to pieces when he has to sit idle all day long, so does a free man. Nothing can be more demoralizing than to keep honest men in idleness, who have not done anything to deserve their ill fortune, when they are anxious to work.

Mr. President, be it only 14 per cent of this sum, or 4 per cent, whatever it is, I can not vote to keep convicts at work when the same money might go to honest free men outside of the penitentiary who are desperately anxious for jobs just like that.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, the amendment immediately before the Senate has to do with the perfection of the House text and simply provides that the prohibition contained in the House text shall not apply to convicts who are on parole or probation.

Briefly stated, there are two reasons why that prohibition should not apply to convicts who are on parole or probation. A convict who has been put on parole or probation, either by a parole board or by a court, is usually put on probation or parole on condition that he obtain employment and support his family and dependents. He is a free man, usually, with that one condition imposed upon him. Therefore, he should not be deprived of the opportunity to labor. He is not in prison, he is outside of prison, he is undertaking to make good, and he ought to be given the opportunity to make good.

The other reason is that most of the road building is by contract. The construction company may employ men within the State from any part of the State. The company which is doing the construction does not know whether its employees are men who have been sentenced but are on parole or probation, and yet if those men were employed, under the provisions of the House text, the State would be deprived of the Federal aid if that situation were discovered. I assume there is no serious objection to the amendment which I propose to perfect the House text.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I think the view expressed by the Senator from Pennsylvania is absolutely full of logic, but it should be made by a citizen to his legislature and not by a Senator to the legislature of a State which employs convict labor. It might be said by a citizen of Virginia, for example, that he feels that none of this money should be used to employ convicts upon the roads, but it should be employed to give free men work.

I believe that here in the Senate we have gone far enough in infringing upon the rights of the respective States. Virginia and the other States, for one reason or another, have seen fit to set up this particular system in reference to their convicts. I do not believe it is our field of activity to go into such a State and indirectly change its legal system or its penal system. I think we may argue against the logic of it in our respective States if it exists there, but certainly the Senate of the United States is not the place to discuss the penal system of any State. I believe when we take these appropriations and place these restrictions around them it is really a form of legalized bribery. It forces the law of the majority of the Senate upon States which for one reason or another prefer a different course of procedure.

So far as the matching provisions go in all these matters they are very unfair. First of all, restrictions are thrown around the appropriations quite often which are obnoxious to the States receiving them. For example, let me refer to the infancy bill. We appropriate a sum of money which is apportioned among the various States, provided those States will match the sum appropriated by the Federal Government and apportioned to them. Then the whole thing is administered under regulations propounded here in Washington, rather than by the representatives of the people in their respective States. Yet the State has no alternative. It must either abide by the Federal regulations or it will not get its share of its own money.

That system has been going on and on and on in many fields. If the State of Virginia desires to work its convicts on its roads, to take a case in point, how can we come here and say to that State, in effect, "You must not work your convicts on your roads, even though your legislature and your representatives desire that they be so worked"? That would be the effect of the pending amendment. If we were dealing with the interstate commerce, we would be in a field well within our rights. We would be in our proper function in regulating convict goods in interstate commerce. But I believe that we are not within our rights and are transgressing upon the sacred rights of the people in their respective States when we try to set at naught a system which they have worked out or to force them to give it up through indirect bribery in the form of funds and appropriations accompanied by such restrictions as I have outlined.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, may I say, in reply to the suggestion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, that 14 per cent of this money or 4 per cent of this money might be used for the purpose of paying convict labor, that it amounts actually to three-tenths of 1 per cent of the money which would be allotted to the State of Virginia in case they change their laws if the amendment offered by the committee is agreed to. The State of Virginia is not obliged to change its laws. Of all the money which is allotted to that State under this bill for Federal aid, something over $2,000,000, the sum of $6,000 would be spent on the convicts and some $1,994,000 on free labor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] to the text of the bill.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I would like to have the amendment read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendment be read for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] proposes, on page 65, line 16, after the word "employed" and before the period, to insert a comma and the following words:

Except this provision shall not apply to convict labor performed by convicts on parole or probation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, in view of the fact that reference has been made to my State as one which works its convicts on the roads, I wish to make a brief statement, because I do not desire that any misapprehension should now prevail in regard to the situation in Florida.

It is my information that the success or the failure of the amendment is very immaterial so far as my State is concerned. Some 20 years ago the convicts in Florida were let out under lease. It happened about that time that I made a campaign for the office of governor of the State and advocated the abolition of the convict-lease system. I was successful in the campaign and had the honor of being governor of the State for four years. During that time recommendations made by myself for discontinuing the lease system, even setting forth the character of legislation in detail that should be enacted, were approved by the legislature and we abolished the convict-lease system completely. I counted this as one of the worth-while achievements of my administration. No convict may be leased for private hire in the State of Florida at the present time, and this has been true for 15 years.

In abolishing the lease system the question arose as to what employment we could give them. Were we to place them in prison and have them idle? Were we to place them in prison or upon a farm and have them engage in the manufacture of articles and thereby come in competition with skilled free labor? Or should we centralize them all on one State farm engaged in the production of farm products and thereby use them as competitors of the farmers of the State? It was my idea, and I think that of a great majority of the people of the State, that we should take care of the sick and the feeble male prisoners and all female prisoners on a State farm and that we should utilize the labor of the able-bodied men in the construction of highways.

This was the origin of the working of convicts on roads in the State of Florida. At that time it gave a great stimulus to road construction and development. Instead of being a deterrent to the employment of free labor, it was a stimulation to the expansion of the great enterprise of road construction and thereby was one of the factors that made jobs for hundreds and thousands of free labor who previously could not obtain employment on road work because of the limited amount of road building.

I wanted to remove any apprehension that might exist that at the present time convict labor is preventing any free labor from obtaining work on Federal highway projects in Florida. It is my understanding that on the Federal projects free labor is used almost entirely at the present time. If any convict labor at all is used, it is so inconsequential that it amounts to nothing.

As a permanent policy I doubt the wisdom of this amendment, but in this emergency I have no objection to the adoption of an amendment of the kind now pending. While I think it is in reality an unwarranted interference with the rights of the States and that it is applying what might be called a "strong-arm" method, taking advantage of a situation and trying to dictate to the local authorities how they shall carry on their local improvements, I think it is merely much ado about nothing. In my State, if I am correctly informed, no one will get employment on account of it. I wish they might. In the other three States I dare say there will not be 200 unemployed free labor who will obtain jobs on account of it. It might work out just the other way. It might have a tendency to curtail road construction, because there would be a necessity for the local county government to apply its funds for the purpose of housing and taking care of idle prisoners and thereby be deprived of the funds for the employment of free labor in the construction of roads.

I do not believe the amendment will accomplish any good, but I do not believe in this emergency it will do any harm. It is merely one of these theoretical and sentimental ideas that we must not have convict labor working when some one else wants a job. So far as the effect of it and its practicability is concerned, I do not think it will be of any benefit whatever to free labor. I shall no doubt vote for the amendment, but I do not think it will accomplish anything at all in behalf of free labor. I hope, however, it may.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. McNARY. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I desire to inquire what is the parliamentary situation?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment proposing to strike out the House text, which, if agreed to, will carry with it the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE].

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I desire to make a further parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BRATTON. A vote in the affirmative will be in favor of striking out the House provision, as amended, and thereby permitting the use of convict labor, while a vote in the negative will be to retain the House language and forbid the use of convict labor?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is a correct statement. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). I understand the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], with whom I have a pair, if present, would vote as I shall vote. Therefore I feel at liberty to vote and vote "yea."

Mr. McNARY (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY]. I am unable to obtain a transfer, and not knowing how she would vote I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], but he and I have agreed that the pair shall not apply to this vote. Therefore I am free to vote and vote "nay."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. COOLIDGE. I desire to say that the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], if present, would be recorded as voting "nay."

Mr. BULKLEY (after having voted in the negative). I inquire if the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. BULKLEY. I feel constrained to withdraw my vote, as I have a general pair with that Senator.

Mr. HATFIELD (after having voted in the negative). I inquire if the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MORRISON] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. HATFIELD. I have a general pair with that Senator and will therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. HASTINGS. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HULL]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. COPELAND. My colleague [Mr. WAGNER] is unavoidably absent. If he were present and permitted to vote, he would vote "nay."

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce that the following Senators are absent on official business: The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MORRISON], and the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS];

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT] with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG];

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. PATTERSON] with the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER]; and

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN] with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN].

I am not advised how any of the Senators named would vote on this question.

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 46, as follows:

So the committee amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOSES. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 8, it is proposed to strike out line 8 to line 11, inclusive, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That section 290, chapter 8, title 44, of the United States Code, be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment is merely to make the language of the bill conform to the law as it now exists. It is a mere formal amendment, and I hope the Senator in charge of the bill may be able to accept it.

Mr. McNARY. I think it is a quite proper amendment, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARKLEY. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 65, line 16, it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, That in the expenditure of the funds hereby appropriated the first paragraph of section 9 of the act of November 9, 1921, shall not apply to publicly owned toll bridges, or approaches thereto, constructed and operated by the highway department of any State.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, this amendment is the substance of the amendment which I offered earlier in the day, but inasmuch as it is a limitation on the appropriation carried in the bill, it is not subject to a point of order. The object of the amendment is to remove the restriction in the present law and in the regulations of the Bureau of Public Roads from the expenditure of Federal aid funds in the building of approaches to public-owned bridges.

Very properly in the beginning of measures for Federal aid, in order not to allow private owners of bridges to charge tolls and use Federal funds in the building of the approaches to their bridges, the original act and the amendments thereto have provided that all roads in the construction of which the Federal Government participates shall be free of any toll. In recent years some of the States have inaugurated a plan of building their own bridges in order to get away from the private toll bridge and in order to guarantee that the bridges might be turned over free to the public as soon as possible, the State legislatures have authorized the issuance of bonds or the expenditure of public money raised by taxation to build bridges, and have provided for reasonable tolls to be charged by the State, with the understanding and the provision of law that as soon as the bridge shall have been paid for out of the tolls it shall immediately become free. Yet the restriction now in the law applies to publicly owned bridges just as it applies to privately owned bridges.

The State highway commission of my State in the last year or two has authorized the expenditure of some $12,000,000 for the building of public bridges over streams in Kentucky. They are being constructed and operated by the State highway commission, and a reasonable toll is being charged the public by the State highway commission in order that a fund may be created with which to pay for the bridge without in any way taking money out of the ordinary road fund raised by taxation.

The amendment I have offered simply permits the Bureau of Public Roads to participate in the construction of highways up to the bridge. It does not require the expenditure of any money out of the Federal Treasury in the building of any bridge; but under the present regulations the State of Kentucky may build a bridge across the Tennessee River, the Cumberland River, the Kentucky River, the Ohio River, or any other river in the State or on its borders, and because of this restriction placed in the law in the beginning the Federal Government will not participate in the construction of the road within 6 miles of that bridge, simply because it did not want originally to encourage the building of private toll bridges. Certainly that restriction has no reason for its existence any longer.

Earlier in the day I sought to secure the adoption of an amendment that would change the law so that permanently that restriction would not apply to bridges built and operated by the State. A point of order was sustained to it; but I have tried it again, as applying to this fund particularly, and hope it will be adopted.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, earlier in the day the very distinguished Senator from Kentucky proposed an amendment having the same general purpose as the one he now proposes. What he has done is to attempt to come within the rule by simply making a limitation, without changing the principle involved.

It is my opinion that this amendment attempts to modify existing law, which is a violation of the rule if done on an appropriation bill. While in one sense it is a limitation, yet the principle involved and the substance of the amendment is not a limitation but a change in an existing statute. For that reason I invoke the rule and make the point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I ask the Senator in charge of the bill to turn to page 72. I ask unanimous consent that we may reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted in line 20, page 72, as I desire to offer an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator state the purpose of his request? I do not quite understand it.

Mr. BORAH. It is my purpose to offer an amendment increasing the amount $27,136, in order to cover the leased wire for carrying market news to and from the capital of the State of Idaho.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the vote whereby the amendment on page 72 was agreed to is reconsidered.

The Senator from Idaho offers an amendment to the amendment, which will be stated.

Mr. BORAH. I move that the amount of $1,406,220 be increased to $1,433,356, making an increase of $27,136.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, this probably would have been done by the committee had its attention been called to the matter. The Market News Service item was reduced, which brought about the necessary discontinuance of the service in five separate cities in the Southern States. The attention of the committee was called to that situation and it restored the item.

This amendment relates to the necessary abandonment of the service between Boise, Idaho, and Spokane. I think probably the service should be continued. It has been carried on for several years, and I have no personal objection, or as chairman of the subcommittee, to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I am constrained to ask the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill to the item at the bottom of page 68, being farm management and practice, the bill calling for an appropriation of $395,467. Under the appropriation coming under this head there has been carried on in my State some work of the very highest importance, which has an added significance and importance by reason of the unfortunate continuance of the drought in that State.

The appropriation was reduced by the Budget in the amount of $25,293 below the figures for last year and was reduced in the House by an additional $25,000. A very vigorous protest has been made by the authorities having charge of the conduct of the work in the State of Montana. I have here a telegram on the subject from the president of our agricultural college.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I did not distinctly understand to which item the Senator refers.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I refer to the item at the bottom of page 68, $395,467 for farm management and practice.

I have here a letter from the head of the bureau, Mr. Englund, who tells us that a reduction of $25,293 was made in this item by the Budget. The House reduced the item $25,000 more. I am offering an amendment to restore the figures to those recommended by the Budget, an increase of $25,000.

I should like to read a telegram from Doctor Atkinson, the president of our agricultural college. He says as follows:

BOZEMAN, MONT., February 23, 1932.

T. J. WALSH,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

We are informed that the House has cut $25,000 out of appropriation for farm management, research, and practice, Bureau of Agricultural Economics, Department of Agriculture. The Bureau of Agricultural Economics put five thousand of this fund into Wilson's research on cooperative basis on problems in cause and economics of range sheep and cattle industry, feeding wheat Montana livestock, drought rehabilitation, low cost dry-land wheat and corn production, also land utilization; bureau supplies about half of working fund. We regard this work of great importance in present situation. It is also highly regarded by both cattle and sheep associations and wheat farmers. We anticipate our State funds will be curtailed because of delinquent taxes. If Bureau of Agricultural Economics cooperative funds are withdrawn, Wilson's work must come to standstill. We understand Senate will consider agricultural bill Tuesday, and item might be reintroduced in Senate. We hope you might see fit to take such action. Olsen, Chief of Bureau of Agricultural Economics, can give detail of cooperation.

ALFRED ATKINSON.

A telegram from President Wilson, who has actual charge of this work, is as follows:

BOZEMAN, MONT., February 23, 1932.

T. J. WALSH,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Re telegram President Atkinson, we feel that the continuation of our research work in cooperation with Bureau of Agricultural Economics, division of farm management, vital and of great value in programs of rehabilitation Montana agriculture. If bureau funds are withdrawn, work will be discontinued.

M. L. WILSON.

I know something about this work and know of the very great value and importance of it. Many of the Senators from the West are particularly well acquainted with President Wilson, who on numerous occasions has appeared before committees of the Congress. The letter from Mr. Englund contains a detailed account of this work, and its importance under the existing conditions can not possibly be magnified. I trust the Senator from Oregon will have no objection to this amendment.

I ask that there be incorporated in the RECORD, in connection with my remarks, the letter to which I have referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
BUREAU OF AGRICULTURAL ECONOMICS,
Washington, D. C., February 25, 1932.

Hon. THOMAS J. WALSH,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR WALSH: In response to your secretary's telephone request yesterday I am outlining below the situation with regard to the reductions which have been made in the appropriation of this bureau for farm management and practice. The facts given below with reference to these appropriation items are substantially as presented in my testimony before the Senate subcommittee on agricultural appropriations.

The appropriation for the current year 1932 for farm management and practice (including cost of production) is $480,760. This was reduced in the Budget submitted to Congress to $455,467, a reduction of $25,293. The House Committee on Appropriations decreased this appropriation by an additional amount of $25,000; and on the floor of the House the item of $35,000, covering economic studies in farm management and farm organization, with special reference to the corn-borer problems, was eliminated. The work under this item is closely related to our other farm-management work. You will note, therefore, that the bill now before the Senate carries a total reduction of $85,293 in this item below the amount of the appropriation for the current year.

Of the total appropriation of $480,760 for farm management and practice, $213,910 is used for other important projects of the bureau, including land economics and agricultural finance, leaving a balance of $266,850 for the division of farm management and costs. The projects of farm management and costs of production are carried on in one division of this bureau under the supervision of one division leader. Considering the amount cut from this allotment in the reduction of $25,293 carried in the Budget as submitted to Congress, and assuming that the additional reduction of $25,000 made by the House committee is distributed proportionately among the various projects, the reduction to the division of farm management and costs will be $31,031. Adding to this reduction the $35,000 eliminated in the item for farm-management studies in relation to the corn-borer situation, the total cut on the division would be $66,031, or nearly 25 per cent below the amount appropriated for the current year.

There is no clear-cut line of demarcation between the farm-management studies and the work carried on under cost of production as these are merely different aspects of the whole problem of effective farm organization. While some studies are devoted exclusively to ascertaining cost of producing major crops, the greater share of all our work in farm management deals partly or mainly with costs of production.

As pointed out in my testimony before the Senate Subcommittee on Appropriations for this department, the reduction shown above can not be met without discontinuing important research work and letting out employees. We have not yet determined specifically where the curtailments of work will be made to meet the reduced appropriations if the appropriation bill should go through with all the cuts just mentioned. With the cut of $25,000 made by the House committee below the Budget estimate, it would be necessary to curtail cooperative arrangements with States, as a considerable part of our work under this appropriation is in this class. This would mean dismissal of cooperative employees on projects that would have to be discontinued. We now have cooperative farm-management projects in 15 States, involving 21 cooperative employees, of whom 3 are in Montana. I mention this since your secretary's inquiry relates particularly to our work in your State. In order to describe more adequately the work we are doing in Montana, I inclose herewith a statement describing briefly our Montana cooperative projects and indicating some of the results obtained thus far.

Farmers now are facing the urgent necessity of making important adjustments in farm operations in order to meet, as far as possible, the necessity imposed upon them by low prices and severe competition as among different producing areas. To leave these adjustments to the costly process of trial and error by individual farmers would be wasteful. We believe it to be a function of public research agencies, State and Federal, to conduct investigations that will aid in the solution of these problems of adjustment. Research in farm management and farm organization is conducted in the belief that these studies will show the way to advantageous adjustments in farming, thus aiding the individual farmer and serving the public interest generally.

Very truly yours,

ERIC ENGLUND,
Assistant Chief of Bureau.

THE RESEARCH WORK OF THE DIVISION OF FARM MANAGEMENT AND COSTS IN THE STATE OF MONTANA

In the current fiscal year the Division of Farm Management and Costs of the Bureau of Agricultural Economics is participating in two projects in Montana. The first is a study of the organization and operation of mechanically equipped wheat farms; the second is a study of the production of sheep under range conditions with incidental attention to range cattle production. For the current fiscal year we are expending $6,090 in Montana; corresponding expenditure for the fiscal year 1931 was $5,912; for the fiscal year 1930 the division expended $1,741 for research work in Montana.

THE ORGANIZATION AND OPERATION OF MECHANICALLY EQUIPPED WHEAT FARMS

In the years following the World War wheat production in Montana under dry-farming conditions was carried on mainly by horse power and on a relatively small scale. A farm having 600 tilled acres was probably larger than the average as late as 1925. Agricultural population had been decreasing prior to that date as a result of declining profits in wheat growing. Then came the general adoption of the tractor, accompanied by the use of the combine-harvester. By 1929 the typical wheat farm had risen in size to about 1,500 acres.

In the transition to large-scale methods costly mistakes were made in amount and kind of equipment purchased. Investments per acre in equipment varied from three to twelve dollars. Local conditions further complicated the problem. Over a 12-year period wheat sown by May 5 yielded 7½ bushels more per acre than that shown two weeks later. For best results cultivation and seeding needed to be done in a period of 18 to 20 days' time. Summer fallow had to be done by June 1 for best results. Thus a twofold problem of the minimum overhead in equipment investment compatible with that necessary to conform to the optimum operation in field practice became too difficult for the solution of the average wheat producer.

To solve these problems on which the success of large-scale farming under Montana conditions depended, the Fairway Farms Corporation, under the guidance of Prof. M. L. Wilson and his well-trained farm management associates, was organized. Nine farms were chosen in various sections of Montana, selected so as to be representative of large farming areas of the State.

The work of this corporation was from the beginning closely tied up with the Montana Agricultural Experiment Station. The corporation furnished the land and other means of production, while the Montana station furnished the personnel for general management and for the guidance of the experiments in organization and practice which were to be undertaken. In the spring of 1929 this division joined in the experimental and investigational work being done in connection with the farms of this corporation. A part of the salary of the specialist who directs the experiments and the study has, since that date, been carried by this division. The unique character of this work, the obviously practical nature of its findings, and the relatively wide applicability of such findings throughout practically all of the dry farming area of the country amply justified our including a cooperative project which would tie this important experimental work into our farm management research program.

The most important part of the study is in connection with the largest farm of the corporation, which is situated near Brockton, Mont., and is called the "Lone Warrior" farm. In reality it is a farm-management "proving grounds." Here under actual farm conditions large numbers of farm machines have been and are still being subjected to the most exacting scientific tests. Costs per hour of operation have been computed, ingenious hitches have been developed for more completely utilizing the power available, and the country has been scouted for machines in use in other areas which might prove effective for Montana conditions.

Tests are being carried on with different-sized units of those machines which proved most effective and the most efficient combinations of large-scale equipment ascertained for different sizes of farms. Results obtained at the "proving grounds" are being further tested on other farms belonging to the Fairway group, and then such worth-while information as that supplied in the following table is taken to the Montana farmers:

Size of tractor	Cash operating cost, fuel, labor, seed, depreciation, per acre	Man labor per acre of crop harvested	Cost of equipment combination per acre	Economic size of land unit
				Acres
3-plow	$7.77	3 hours 10 minutes	$5.50	800
4-plow	6.62	2 hours 32 minutes	5.00	1,200
6-plow	4.65	1 hour 48 minutes	4.50	1,800
12-plow	3.82	54 minutes	3.50	3,000

The tractor is probably the most costly piece of large-scale farming equipment. When the tractor is either too small or too large for the area of land being farmed much of the profit in large-scale technic is sacrificed. This table, based on careful experiments under Montana conditions, furnishes a guide as to the proper size of tractor for various sizes of farms.

The practice of summer fallowing in wheat production is comparatively new in Montana and the results of experiments by the Fairway Farms disclose wide variations in cost of the different methods which may be utilized.

The comparative cost per acre of different summer-fallow systems

PLOWED FALLOW

	Per acre
Plowing	$1.75
First duckfooting	.35
Second duckfooting	.35
Third duckfooting	.35

PLOWLESS DUCKFOOT FALLOW

Duckfooting	.45

On a farm having 900 acres in summer fallow the difference in cost between plowed and plowless duckfoot fallow is $1,170. The present goal is to reduce the cost of summer fallowing still lower to $1 per acre.

So successful have been the efforts on the "Lone Warrior" farm in continually hammering down the cost of producing wheat under large-scale farming methods that many hundreds of scientific men and farmers visit this farm at Brockton each year.

With the present extremely low levels in wheat prices much emphasis is being placed on the study of cash and noncash costs, and ways and means are being considered whereby some measure of profit may still accrue to the large-scale wheat producer.

The unique idea of experimental farms operated to prove the validity of farm-management principles before they are recommended for general adoption by the farming public has borne gratifying results in Montana. The initial plan of crop and livestock production, as laid out for each of the nine original Fairway Farms, has in nearly every instance been altered in some important feature to meet conditions not apparent at the time the farms were set up. As a consequence, the advice emanating from the Agricultural Economics Department of this experiment station for farmer consumption has been well received, because it was tempered by practical experience and first-hand knowledge of the major agricultural portions of the State of Montana.

With the rapidly changing economic conditions, coupled with the unfortunate conditions rising out of drought and grasshopper infestation, it is obvious that such work as has been carried on under this project is more timely and indispensable now than ever before. Further sweeping readjustments have been made necessary and work such as has been done under this project, which is of such immediate and practical value to farmers, would seem to be of greatest possible value as a measure of relief.

Since the agricultural appropriation bill, in its present form, provides for a cut of nearly 25 per cent in the budget of this division (including the corn-borer research item), it is going to be necessary to discontinue our connection with this project, as with practically all others of this sort throughout the country. We shall, of course, use some members of our regular staff, so far as possible, to finish going projects and salvage, so far as possible, the unfinished work. However, it will be impossible for us to continue the sort of support we are giving to this Montana project.

As indicated above, the results of this study are of general application in dry-farming areas. They supplement in an excellent way the results of studies of a cooperative nature aimed at similar problems which we are carrying on in North Dakota, South Dakota, and Kansas.

THE RANGE-SHEEP STUDY

The division of farm management and costs is connected with this livestock study in Montana in a way in general similar to the connection already described with reference to the study on the organization and operation of wheat farms. The objectives are as follows:

1. To determine the most economical and effective form of organization and methods of operation of ranches in the production of sheep, both as a specialized enterprise and in combination with other livestock.

2. To determine, so far as possible, the specific forces and conditions which have been shaping the course of the range sheep enterprise since the World War, particularly with a view of projecting probable developments into the immediate future.

3. To determine the nature and extent of competition between sheep and cattle for the use of range land in Montana.

4. To determine the most economical and profitable methods of management of sheep production under range and feeding conditions, including the handling of range and the feeding of sheep.

This study, while incomplete, has already yielded valuable information. With very low wheat prices, the proposal to use wheat in the fattening of livestock was made. This problem was attacked in connection with this project by the securing of detailed and accurate information from ranchers and others actually using wheat and other feeds in their rations. The following tabulation was derived from this phase of the study:

Comparison of beet-pulp and non-beet-pulp feeding rations for sheep in Montana, 1930–31

	Days of pasturage	Days to reach full grain feed	Days length of feeding period	Total gain per head, pounds	Initial weight of lambs, pounds	Total pounds grain fed	Total pounds hay fed	Total pounds pulp fed	Total feed cost per head	Per cent death loss	Net profit per head
Pulp, grain, hay	30	21	88	27	67	75	100	600	1.75	3	1.35
Grain and hay	25	26	100	28	63	95	225	------	2.25	2	.60

The results indicate that it is practical to use wheat as the main concentrate in the fattening of lambs. It shows, however, that larger gains may apparently be made by the inclusion of some more succulent feed, such as beet pulp, and that the exclusive ration of hay and wheat is unsatisfactory. These and other current findings are being made available as rapidly as possible through current reports and extension work.

This study also is incomplete and should be further prosecuted. It strikes at some very real problems of the range livestock producer. These problems are not peculiar to Montana. Range livestock producers throughout the range country are in great need of the sort of information such projects furnish. We are participating in such work in Wyoming, Colorado, and Texas. The same conditions which are necessitating our withdrawal from the large-farm study, will compel us to drop the livestock work.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Montana will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Montana offers the following amendment: On page 68, line 23, strike out "$395,467" and insert in lieu thereof "$420,467."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That makes it exactly in accordance with the recommendation of the Budget.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, if I correctly understand the position of the Senator and that which he seeks, he desires to restore the estimate of the Bureau of the Budget?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes, sir.

Mr. McNARY. The Budget estimate was reduced by the House committee and sustained by House action in the sum of $60,000. In order to carry on this work, which the Senator states is very important, the Senator then proposes to restore the Budget estimate?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The estimate of the Director of the Budget; yes.

Mr. SMOOT. That means $25,000?

Mr. McNARY. That is what I was asking. Is it the proposition of the Senator from Montana to restore the whole estimate of the Budget, or $25,000 of the estimate?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Twenty-five thousand dollars.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the Senator from Oregon. A moment ago the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] secured an increase of the appropriation for the Market News Service. I desire to know whether that covers the Spokane office.

Mr. McNARY. That covers the service between Boise, Idaho, and Spokane, Wash., as estimated for, which offices have been continuously in existence.

Mr. DILL. I simply wanted to know whether or not the Spokane office was covered.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment found on page 85, commencing in line 14, was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That notice will be entered.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 37, line 2, after the sum "$1,431,560," it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That any unexpended balance in the allotment of $15,000, under the appropriation for this purpose for the fiscal year 1932, for the establishment of a pecan station in the middle eastern Mississippi region is hereby continued available during the fiscal year 1933 under the same conditions and for the same purposes specified in such allotment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. President, I shall say just a word. I think it is agreeable to the Senator in charge of the bill for this amendment to be adopted. It simply continues the availability of a few thousand dollars during the fiscal year 1933. Some complications arose with reference to the acquirement of land. Those have all been adjusted now; but the work can not be completed within this fiscal year.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. President, I desire to offer another amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

On page 57, line 8, strike out "$145,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$155,000."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, what is the item to which this amendment refers?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Insects affecting man and animals.

Mr. McNARY. That is the item the department spoke about in connection with the buffalo gnat?

Mr. STEPHENS. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. President, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD a copy of a letter from Hon. WILL M. WHITTINGTON, Representative from the third district of Mississippi, relating to this matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., February 25, 1932.

Senator HUBERT D. STEPHENS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR STEPHENS: I have conferred with Dr. C. L. Marlatt, of the Bureau of Entomology, with respect to the amendment to provide $10,000 for combating buffalo gnats in the lower Mississippi Valley, including the Yazoo Mississippi Delta, and he informs me that it is only necessary in the agricultural appropriation bill, page 57, in line 8, to change the amount of $145,000 to $155,000, with an explanation that the additional $10,000 is "for study of methods of controlling and combating buffalo gnats in the lower Mississippi Valley, including the Yazoo Mississippi Delta." The amendment follows the language in the bill, "For insects affecting man and animals."

I am accordingly handing you herewith a memorandum in duplicate, which is sufficient, according to the instructions of Doctor Marlatt.

I want to congratulate you upon getting the agreement, and I will try my best to hold it in the House. I am sure you will see that the matter is inserted on the floor of the Senate.

Very sincerely,

WILL M. WHITTINGTON.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

On page 49, line 3, strike out "$613,640" and insert in lieu thereof "$615,840."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the Bureau of the Budget reduced the estimate for forest products and for the Forest Products Laboratory by $25,000. The House further reduced the Budget estimate by $2,200.

The Forest Products Laboratory is about to move into a new building. Since these estimates were passed upon by the Bureau of the Budget and by the House it has been found that the item for electricity, steam, water, gas, and maintenance will exceed similar items in the present laboratory quarters by $12,700 per year. All I am seeking to do by this amendment is to restore the $2,200 by which the House reduced the item below the Budget estimate. While it seems a small item, it is of vital importance, in view of the drastic reduction made in the estimate by the Bureau of the Budget. I trust that in view of the fact that there is an estimate for it, the Senator from Oregon will feel justified, in so far as he can, in accepting the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 40, line 4, the Senator from Texas moves to strike out "$147,950" and to insert in lieu thereof "$158,170."

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I would like to have the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill.

The amendment I have offered is designed to restore an item of $10,220 heretofore carried for the maintenance of an experimental farm at San Antonio, Tex.

Doctor Taylor, in his testimony before the House committee, said the following, as appears on page 246 of the hearings:

Doctor TAYLOR. That is a field station which has been maintained on land owned by the city, which I think originally was a feature of their sewage-disposal plant, but which the city has grown out around and, as we understand it, is not particularly interested in the maintenance of at the present time.

It has been experimentation with crops under irrigation—cotton to some extent, fruits to some extent, forage crops to some extent, crop rotation studies.

The Budget eliminated that item on the assumption that the local interests were not particularly caring about its continuance. Doctor Taylor states it has been of great local benefit.

I desire to have incorporated in the RECORD a resolution passed by a conference of farmers of that vicinity.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution passed by the conference of farmers, 4-H club leaders, teachers, and citizens, attending the 1-day corn grading and marketing school in the auditorium of the Express Publishing Co., San Antonio, Tex., January 20, 1932

Be it resolved, That we, the farmers, 4-H club leaders, and citizens, assembled in the 1-day corn grading and marketing school at San Antonio, express our appreciation and indorsement of the splendid work put over on behalf of south Texas agriculture at the United States experiment farm on the South Flores Road in Bexar County, Tex.

The crop rotation demonstrations for a period of years with all of the leading farm crops of Bexar County and south Texas have been especially instructive and valuable for this district; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the Secretary of Agriculture for his information; that the said Secretary of Agriculture be petitioned and urged to continue and maintain the operation of the United States experiment farm in Bexar County; be it further

Resolved, That the county agent, as chairman of the corn grading and marketing school, be requested and authorized to sign and submit this resolution on behalf of the farmers of Bexar County, Tex.

FRED W. MALLY,
Chairman Corn Grading and Marketing School.
SAN ANTONIO, TEX., January 20, 1932.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Oregon will allow the amendment to be incorporated in the bill, and it can be threshed out in conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, there are 27 printed amendments lying on the clerk's desk which I submitted at the request of the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], in his absence.

I also have lying on my desk a 36-page speech prepared by the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], which I promised that I would read to the Senate provided he did not return in time to read it himself. I hope it will not be necessary for me to speak to the amendments, or to read the speech, not because I am not interested in the speech, but I know the Senator from Tennessee would submit it more eloquently than it would be possible for me to do. Unless the Senator from Oregon insists upon a final vote to-night, I shall await the return of the Senator from Tennessee. If a vote is to be insisted upon to-night, I wish to proceed with the 36-page address, with which I hope to entertain the Senate for at least an hour and a half.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, it seems to me impossible for the Senate to conclude the consideration of the agricultural appropriation bill to-night. The junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has given notice that to-morrow he will ask for a reconsideration of the so-called grasshopper item.

This long speech is to be delivered sometime either to-day by the distinguished Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], or by the author, the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]. It is a matter of indifference to me who delivers the speech, but inasmuch as it is now 10 minutes of 5, and there are some other amendments to be considered, and the Senator from Tennessee will return to-morrow, I shall not ask that we go forward any longer with the bill this evening.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I desire to file a notice of motion to suspend the rules.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The notice will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Kentucky presents the following notice:

Pursuant to the provisions of Rule XL of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby give notice in writing that I shall hereafter move to suspend paragraph 4 of Rule XVI, for the purpose of proposing to the bill (H. R. 7912), making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, the following amendment, viz, on page 65, line 16, after the word "employed" insert the following: "Provided, That hereafter in the administration of the Federal Highway act and acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto, the first paragraph of section 9 of the act of November 9, 1921, shall not apply to publicly-owned toll bridges or approaches thereto, constructed and operated by the highway department of any State."

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I give notice that after the passage of the pending appropriation bill I shall endeavor to call up the House bill 8397, making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933.

SHORT SELLING ON STOCK EXCHANGES

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I report favorably from the Committee on Banking and Currency with amendments the resolution (S. Res. 84) to investigate the practice of "short selling" of listed securities upon stock exchanges and its effect on actual values (submitted by Mr. HASTINGS on December 14, 1931), and ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection the report will be received and, under the rule, the resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF PRESIDENT HOOVER—ADDRESS OF SENATOR SIMEON D. FESS

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a radio address delivered by the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], on the evening of March 1, 1932, over a coast-to-coast hook-up.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In prior periods of depression and unemployment through which our country has had to pass, the administration then in control has confined its efforts to prevent the adoption of unsound remedies to which the Government might easily resort. In the long-range view such remedies prove worse than the disease. Wise statesmanship has in the past, as it will in the future, guarded the public against such unwise steps.

In the present world-wide breakdown the President has steadily guided the Nation in the safe course by standing adamantly against such proposals as the dole, so ardently advocated in many quarters by many good people.

Because of this stand he has been cruelly attacked as one without human sympathy for the unemployed. Were he a man without record on relief work, these attacks might have some weight. But in the face of the generally admitted fact that Mr. Hoover would have been the one man first to be thought of in connection with relief work in this crisis by whoever might have been the President, whether he be Republican or Democrat, these puerile attacks are revealed in their true light.

What the President desires and what he is working to insure are wages for the employable, not a dole for the unemployable. He is striving to avoid what the famous British economist, Mr. Keynes, has warned against.

"Since 1921," he says, "we have paid out to the unemployed in cash a sum of about $2,500,000,000—and have got literally nothing for it." He continues, "This sum would have built 1,000,000 houses. * * * It far exceeds the total value of all the mines of every description we possess." In speaking of the waste of the dole system, he said: "The waste through unemployment since 1921 has mounted up to approximately $10,000,000,000, a sum which would be nearly sufficient to build all the railways in the country twice over."

It is the first step of such a policy that the President is contending against. He well knows that the step once taken will not be retraced, but will be repeated; hence his determination to avoid it and his concern for resumption of business activity to insure employment.

In the onset he sought in conference with leaders of labor and capital to mobilize the agencies of industry to secure the maximum of employment and insure against labor troubles. He then drafted the best leadership in business to organize the helpful forces of the entire Nation to care for the unemployed awaiting a chance to work. In this way there has been called into action the finest quality of a great people who have poured out their means to lessen the hurt of the unemployed.

In the meantime there was inaugurated the most stupendous public-building program ever undertaken by any country at any time. This program involved the expenditure of three quarters of a billion dollars, or three times the amount of the next largest expenditure for any preceding year—an amount almost double the total cost of the construction of the Panama Canal.

As Government construction at most can employ but a fraction of the unemployed, private productive industry is and must ever remain the chief source of employment. The farm, the factory, the mine, transportation, etc., are the chief agencies to which labor must look for wages. To make this possible the country's banking system must readily respond to the needs of investment in industry and commerce in the employment of labor. The banks are the circulatory system of business.

Our country is happily possessed of an abundance of natural resources; in fact, it has all the basic elements of a sound prosperity, but for the time being seriously interrupted. Our farms are as fertile as ever, and their productive ability is unimpaired, but the farmer is without a demand for his product at a profit. Our manufacturing plants are all intact, capable as ever to produce the world's needs, only awaiting a demand for goods. Our transportation system is the best, capable of serving our people with the cheapest, safest, most expeditious, and efficient service known to man. Our managerial ability in the organization of industry, where a better article is being produced at cheaper cost to the purchaser, is well known to the business world both in Europe and America. Our efficiency in labor, insuring the largest output per man, at a good wage and yet at a lower price to the public, is the outstanding fact of labor in all the world. While our banking resources lead all the world, having within our borders more than half of all the known gold on the globe, and two-thirds of the sound securities of the world, the strain on our credit system has put it to an extreme test. All of the foregoing elements of business prosperity are present, but generally deranged, the result of a world upheaval which suspended for the time all fundamental principles of sound finance by substituting Government decree for the common dicta of business principles, induced if not compelled by the exigencies of war which involved almost all the peoples on the earth.

Never before had the world so vividly experienced the real meaning of war. The end was not reached when the firing ceased. The evils persist long after the armies disband.

The death of 10,000,000 of the flower of youth, the permanent disability of 15,000,000 more young men of like quality, the actual destruction of $50,000,000,000 of property, and the mortgaging of the future of $60,000,000,000 involving staggering debts to hang over the heads of nations with the inevitable breakdown of the morale of the people, such were the conditions which created an economic debacle that can not be easily relieved and with which we are now dealing. In reality the problem of the aftermath of war in the language of President Hoover is a battle line on many fronts.

The penalty of the violation of economic law, even in war, is just as inevitable as in the case of the violation of the law of physics. When production is carried on for war's destructive purposes price will have no relation to value. It will involve great borrowing in an orgy of wild buying. Money will be abundant, borrowing will be easy, and banks will loan on an increasingly high estimate of collateral. Such an overstimulated inflation of values must inevitably be followed by a period of disastrous deflation with consequent default of payment and ultimate embarrassment.

Bank loans made on advancing price level are difficult to pay on a declining commodity level. The borrower unable to pay, the bank refusing to renew on the same security, and unwilling to foreclose, the assets become frozen and confidence in the bank is lost, depositors begin to withdraw, liquid assets become depleted, runs are started, and, in many cases, banks are closed. In almost all cases banks have thus been compelled to withhold funds from productive industry to meet a possible run. This situation accounts for the refusal of banks to make loans to industry, no matter how sound the borrower or how safe the collateral. Industry unable to borrow was starved for want of capital, and compelled to slow down, and in many cases to shut down, with the result of throwing labor out of employment. The banks were not at fault. Thousands of them throughout the country, most of them sound, with adequate securities, but not convertible into cash, were caught in a depositors' panic of withdrawal and compelled to close their doors. In some cities not a single bank remained open. Those which were open were compelled to refuse loans, not because they did not have the funds nor for want of adequate security of the borrower but to retain the necessary cash in order to meet a possible run, which might be started at any time. The citizen who wishes to build a house is denied the chance of employing so much labor because of this fear of a run on the bank compelling denial of the loan. In this situation we find abundance of capital, but instead of its being at work it is in hiding, afraid to invest. The arteries of business are clogged; the lifeblood of enterprise is not freely circulating. This credit situation ever since the market collapse has been and still is the problem before the country, in which the brilliant leadership of President Hoover challenges the admiration of all citizens without regard to party affiliation.

To open the arteries of business is the point of attack and has been for months the major concern of the President.

The first step taken last June was the moratorium to give Germany time in which to adjust her obligations coming due, which she declared herself unable to pay. A default and financial collapse, which would render worthless $3,000,000,000 worth of German securities held by American citizens, would produce a situation here in the United States difficult to fathom; hence this important step by which the Allies agreed to give Germany one year in which to adjust her obligations. The United States agreed to postpone for one year the 1931 payment of the foreign loans, giving the debtor countries 10 years in which to make up the postponed payment. The situation was further endangered by the abandonment by Great Britain of the gold standard, an act which shocked the business world and called for speedy action by the administration. The economic breakdown throughout the world was the occasion to overturn governments, which in many parts of the world tumbled like a house of cards.

The next step was the National Credit Corporation, which created a pool of $500,000,000, to which a solvent bank endangered by a run might apply for funds and thus remove the danger. The value of this plan was the removal of the fear of depositors by putting at the disposal of the bank adequate funds to meet a likely run. This resource was an assurance against the necessity of voluntary closing of a bank with sound but not liquid assets.

This corporation is designed to assist endangered banks. It does not directly serve other elements, such as the farmer, who had looked to the farm-loan bank for relief. The impairment of the country's credit system had seriously depleted the funds of this Government agency. The next step to be taken was, therefore, an increase in the loanable funds of the farm-loan system to the amount of $125,000,000 for relief of the farmer who could meet the requirements of the act.

The next step looked to necessary financing of industries. The drastic deflation of commodity values and its effect upon credit facilities made refinancing of industries, such as railroading, most difficult. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation was created to meet this situation It provides $2,000,000,000 credit facilities to be loaned to banks, insurance companies, and other financial institutions, and also to railroads, in order to supply funds for necessary improvements and to meet the needs of productive industry. These loans, which will be adequately secured and repaid, will substantially insure increased employment by making available from eight to ten billion dollars of commercial credit and should go far to revive industry, reduce unemployment, and lead out of the depression.

While the act permits loans only to financial and business institutions, it will benefit all the people to a degree by resuming employment and increasing the purchasing power of the public. Every unit of business engaged in supplying the railroads will benefit in additional employment of labor.

A fourth step was the law signed by the President last Saturday to liberalize the Federal reserve system by broadening the base for the issuance of Federal reserve notes and enlarging the rediscount field. It is asserted on expert authority that this law will increase the money in circulation by at least $1,000,000,000. It will have a wholesome effect in increasing the commodity price level, which in turn will stimulate all business, thereby further reducing unemployment.

Much may be expected from this item of emergency legislation.

Before the meeting of the Seventy-second Congress the President announced a 12-point program of relief, which was repeated in a special message to Congress on January 7. The program, completed up to date, includes six of his proposals.

Three other proposals to strengthen the credit ability are also before Congress, but have not as yet received final action.

One of these is a plan looking to the reopening of closed banks. A second seeks to establish greater protection for the depositor. The third is the home-loan central mortgage bank system, patterned after the Federal reserve system to do for the long-term note, secured by real-estate mortgage, what the Federal reserve system does for the short-term commercial paper. When a system is devised to make it possible to apply one's savings to the ownership of a home, to liquefy assets tied up in real estate, it will be one of the most important acts of all legislation to come out of this period of stress and strain.

I have taken no notice of the usual items which claim the attention of a President, such as balancing the Budget and conducting public affairs in the usual way. I have confined myself to emergency measures to care for situations never before faced in our country in times of peace.

Whatever may be the judgment of the present day upon this constructive program of relief, in which the Democrats, I am glad to say, cooperated, the historian of the future will point out the quiet but brilliant efforts of the President, whose leadership in this crisis will ever command the admiration of all America without regard to party affiliation.

The extremes to which partisan interests in a presidential year extend are illustrated by the allegation of a type of politicians and a certain element of the press that the world breakdown is attributable to President Hoover. Such charges are on a par with those that the President is responsible for droughts, storms at sea, and earthquakes. Such utterances are a reflection upon the intelligence of the American people.

Our people in due time will come to realize their good fortune in having at the head of the Nation during the period when economic chaos enveloped the earth like a huge eclipse a man with the clear vision, the intellectual grasp, the human sympathy, the organizing ability, the dominating personality, and the courageous leadership of Herbert Hoover.

THURSDAY, MARCH 3, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, the God of love and compassion, hear us in this moment of our speechless pain. Do Thou harken unto the voiceless appeals of our country in behalf of the breaking hearts of our notable son and daughter. Look Thou upon their upturned faces, marred with an anguish that only a mother knows. Infinite God, give divine comfort to Rachel as she weeps for her lost child and restore her baby boy to the folds of heavenly love and devotion. Sustain them with succor, courage, and help and give immediate guidance and direction to those who are seeking the fiends of this ruthless crime. Deliver us from the criminal heathens of our land. They go browsing about as demons, clawing like beasts, gnawing like worms, and killing like the imps of midnight. Great God, let a gale of wrath come from Thy throne, intervene in their hellish plans, and spare our country from the perils of the racketeer and the kidnaper. Hear us, O Thou Ancient of Days, and grant that softness may be taken out of the law. Let quick justice be administered, and let it swell like a mountain bulging from the level of a plain. O God, rescue our homes from godless indifference and arouse them with a revival of genuine religion. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

BALANCING THE BUDGET

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday evening, March 1, there was delivered at Washington an address over radio entitled "Balancing the Budget." This speech is a lucid analysis of the tax and Budget situation, and a courageous and masterful presentation of it from a patriotic point of view. It was delivered by my friend and colleague, Judge C. R. CRISP, the acting chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, an outstanding Member of Congress and one of its real leaders.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including this speech.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

When the national honor and security of our country are involved the patriotism of our citizens reaches an exalted plane, and they are willing even to die for their country. Is not our country as dear to us in peace time as in war?

We are now facing a grave national emergency. To meet the situation heavy additional taxes must be levied. With great gratification I say that in the preparation of the new tax bill by the Ways and Means Committee there has been no political partisanship, but Democrats and Republicans are working side by side in perfect harmony, all actuated by patriotic love of country. The bill we report will be neither a Democratic nor a Republican tax bill but a Government bill, an American bill. It will be our bill and your bill, and it will be our responsibility and your responsibility to rally to our country's needs. Let us remember that pocketbook patriotism is a very real kind of patriotism. The welfare of us all demands that the situation be courageously met by our citizenry.

The Treasury of the United States at the end of the fiscal year, June 30, 1932, will have a deficit of over $2,150,000,000, provided no new appropriations are authorized by this Congress. If new ones are made, the deficit will be correspondingly increased. Without going into details as to the reasons for this deficit or as to who is responsible for it, a condition and not a theory confronts the Nation, and it must be courageously met. In my judgment, if the chosen representatives of the people in Congress measure up to their responsibility, they will forget self and party, courageously perform the duty facing them, and levy sufficient taxes to balance the Budget. Without balancing the Budget the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the Glass-Steagall bill, the rural credit bill, and every other temporary relief measure will prove a futile and disappointing palliative. The corner stone on which economic recovery depends, the sanest and wisest governmental policy for relieving the unemployment situation and giving employment to millions of our splendid people now idle, is a balanced Budget. By balancing the Budget is meant keeping as much money in the Treasury as is spent out of it.

At the end of the fiscal year, July 1, 1931, there was a deficit in the Treasury of $903,000,000. That has now been eliminated as a Treasury deficit, but the amount has been added to our bonded indebtedness, which draws interest to be paid by our taxpayers. On June 30, 1932, another Treasury deficit of over $2,150,000,000 will be added to our national debt, on which interest also must be paid. Thus, in two years our public debt has been increased over $3,000,000,000. This means that during the last two years the United States has spent $3,000,000,000 more than it collected in revenue. No individual, no corporation, no nation can maintain its credit by pursuing such an unwise policy. Unbalanced budgets largely contributed to the economic chaos in Europe.

To-day, with the United States spending billions of dollars more than it takes in as revenue, some United States Government bonds, the premier security of the world, are selling at 89 cents on the dollar. If we continue to issue Government bonds, they will further depreciate, all private and industrial bonds, stocks, lands, and property of every kind will depreciate, and economic chaos will be inevitable. Foreign nationals who have money on deposit in the United States banks are becoming alarmed as to the stability of the American dollar and are withdrawing funds from the United States and withdrawing gold from our vaults.

The unbalanced Budget has caused the great banking institutions to call loans when they become due, to refuse to make new loans to industry, and to sacrifice bonds, stocks, and other securities, in order to become liquid. They know not when the United States will offer to the public another bond issue of Government securities and they are holding their funds to be ready to purchase these securities instead of loaning funds to industry or private individuals. Whether from patriotism or merely from the business belief that the Government bond offers the best chance of recovery from present low levels and consequent profit, this is the policy they are pursuing. If the Budget is balanced these bankers will know that it will not be necessary for the Government to sell more bonds and that they must therefore find a use for their money, and thus they will again perform the proper function of bankers by extending leniency to solvent debtors and making loans to industries, thus enabling them to again operate and furnish employment.

A balanced Budget will restore confidence, allay fear, and tend to prevent hoarding; and if these obstacles are overcome we may have ground for hope that economic recovery will be speedy. The deficits of 1931 and 1932 are past history and must be added to our national debt. We are now seeking to balance the Budget by the end of the fiscal year, June 30, 1933, and to do so Congress must levy additional taxes to raise one and a quarter billion dollars, a Herculean task.

But some may say, "Why levy additional taxes; why not sell more bonds to meet the financial needs of the Government"? Such a policy will inevitably result in depreciation in value of United States bonds, of all other securities, and of all property, real and personal; and to effectuate the sale of further United States bonds, of necessity, higher rates of interest would have to be paid, entailing additional tax burdens upon our people.

A pseudotheory is advanced by some that the emergency may be met by issuing greenbacks. During the War between the States the Federal Government issued greenbacks to the amount of $449,338,902, secured by 40 per cent gold reserve, only approximately one-third of our present revenue need, which later sold as low as 46 cents on the dollar. Such a policy would destroy the value of all saving accounts of men, women, and children in the United States and fill the country with fiat money of uncertain and fluctuating value. No government can run a printing press, print money in unlimited quantity, and maintain its value. Germany, France, and Italy tried it with disastrous effect. A few years ago for 25 cents of our money we could purchase a million dollars' worth of German marks.

The Government is not made of money. The Government has no money except what it gets out of the people. The only way to meet the present situation is by additional taxes. The question is what taxes will be most productive of revenue, least harmful to business, and fairest to all concerned.

Some advocate as a revenue measure the repeal of the Volstead Act and the eighteenth amendment and the levy of a tax on spirits and beer. Unless the eighteenth amendment is repealed, which would require submitting it not only to Congress but to the legislatures of the 48 States, a tax on spirits would be unconstitutional; and a tax on beer would necessitate the repeal of the Volstead Act, which this Congress will not do. Therefore these suggestions are impossible of consideration by the committee in connection with this tax bill.

The overwhelming sentiment of Congress is that the fairest taxes are income taxes, for under them those best able to bear the burden are the ones taxed; but with business stagnated and billions of losses sustained by the large taxpayers, no matter how high the rate levied on incomes of individuals and corporations the requisite amount of money can not be produced, for income taxes are paid only if a profit is made, and recent profits have been relatively small. Income taxes have constituted the principal source of revenue for the United States Government. From them have been collected, with low rates, as much as $2,200,000,000 in a year. The Treasury estimates that under the present law revenue from income and corporate taxes for this fiscal year have dropped to $657,000,000. The tax bill which the Ways and Means Committee will report will include large increases in the income-tax rates and in the estate taxes, and will have a mother gift tax to protect the estate taxes; but even with these large increases we can not hope to raise more than two hundred and fifty million additional revenue from these sources, which leaves $1,000,000,000 to be raised from some kind of excise taxes or reduction in Government expenses. The committee is giving earnest and thoughtful consideration to the best way to raise this colossal sum so as to least injure business and to place the burden on those best able to bear it.

It is freely admitted that governmental expenses are too large and that they must and shall be reduced, and the House of Representatives is endeavoring to reduce Federal expenditures so as to require the levying of as few taxes as possible. The Budget for the next fiscal year totals $4,100,000,000—much too great a sum and recklessly extravagant. It should be reduced by hundreds of millions of dollars. But certain items can not be reduced. Over a billion one hundred million to pay interest on and to provide amortization for retirement of our public debt; one billion for compensation, insurance, pensions, and hospitalization of veterans; five hundred millions for projects authorized by law, such as road funds, public-building construction, waterway improvements, etc.; and six hundred and forty millions yearly for maintenance of the Army and Navy for national defense. You will observe, therefore, that Congress must make its reduction from a remaining Budget of about $900,000,000. It is my hope that Congress will cut appropriations as close to the bone as is consistent with efficient and economical administration of government.

While tax burdens are overwhelming, the burden that crushes the average citizen is that of county, State, and municipal taxes, over which Congress has no control, and not Federal taxes. Out of 120,000,000 people, only 2,000,000 pay income tax to the Federal Government, and these taxes are paid only on net incomes. Of course, the average citizen pays indirect taxes, but the amount of Federal tax paid by him is negligible compared to the State, city, and county taxes he is forced to carry.

I appeal to patriotic American citizens to ponder and consider well this situation, to gird themselves with fortitude and strength, and to be willing in this emergency for a year or two to bear additional tax burdens in order to balance our Budget, upon the accomplishment of which rest the peace, happiness, and stability of our Government and the welfare of all of us. As a member of the Ways and Means Committee, I shall urge that the additional taxes be collected only during the emergency, and that the law itself shall specify that they shall cease on a specified date. With a balanced Budget, I sincerely believe economic recovery will follow, and that these increased taxes will not long be needed; and may I assure you, my unseen hearers, that as soon as the fiscal condition of the Treasury warrants it, Congress will promptly reduce taxation?

FEDERAL TRADE PRACTICE CONFERENCES

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the subject of Federal trade practice conferences.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Speaker, should this honorable body adopt any measure which will cripple, hamper, or prevent the holding of trade-practice conferences by the Federal Trade Commission it would wipe out the most constructive work which this Government has ever attempted in its relationship to business. If it should do this, it will, I am sure, do so in ignorance of what a trade-practice conference is, what it was intended to accomplish, and what it has actually accomplished for business.

This is particularly true with reference to the smaller and medium-sized concerns engaged in both manufacture and distribution.

When I mention small and medium-sized concerns I do not reflect in any measure on the larger establishments. Nor do I intend to infer that the use of unfair methods of competition is confined to any particular class. I simply lay emphasis on the small so-called independent units because the larger concerns are strong enough to weather any unfair competitive storm, while the smaller concerns, particularly under present business conditions, would soon find themselves at the mercy of the waves.

Whether, in the competitive struggle, one yields to the temptation to violate the Federal Trade Commission, the Clayton or the Sherman Acts depends entirely on the individual, be he an executive of a large corporation or the proprietor of the smallest establishment.

Unfortunately it is within the power of one unconscionable concern to establish practices which, although violative of every rule of fair play, compel honest competitors to follow its lead or suffer the loss of considerable volumes of business.

True it is that an application for complaint may be filed with the Federal Trade Commission against such an unconscionable concern and if it is deemed to have violated the law the commission, after investigation and after trial and judgment and after appeal to the United States circuit court and after certiorari to the United States Supreme Court, may successfully order it to "cease and desist"; but while the wheels of justice are thus slowly grinding over the course of from two to five years there is no way to stop the accused from reaping an illegal harvest, to the detriment of honest men and to the irreparable injury to the industry he disgraces.

All of this harmful influence and loss of time, money, and business is prevented through the holding of a trade-practice conference.

On this subject I feel qualified to speak. I have not only examined the trade-practice conferences held by many industries but have participated in this procedure held for the industry of which I am a member. In my own industry we were confronted with illegal, wasteful, and harmful practices, for which, perhaps, no one in particular was responsible, but from which all suffered. Money which should have been going into profits was being wasted in meeting illegal and harmful practices; time which should have been spent in devising better ways to serve the public was absorbed in devising ways to meet secret rebates and other illegal and unfair competition; and under advice of competent counsel we applied to the Federal Trade Commission for a trade-practice conference.

To meet the requirements of such an application it was necessary to convince the commission of our good faith, to admit the existence of illegal practices used generally throughout the industry, to furnish a list of every concern engaged in the industry, those within as well as without our association, so that each should receive an invitation from the Federal Trade Commission to attend the conference, thus providing that whatever was to be done would be exposed to the view of all and subject to objection of any who cared to object.

The conference was assembled under the auspices of the commission, and all that transpired was stenographically recorded and officially reported to it. We were impressively told that the rules of a trade-practice conference could not change the law; that the conference rules could not be used as a cloak for price fixing, division of territory, allocation of customers, or any other illegal practices. Rules describing and denouncing the illegal and wasteful practices which burdened our industry were proposed, separately discussed, and separately voted on. These rules, as submitted to the commission, covered the following practices:

Inducing breach of existing contracts; commercial bribery; secret rebates and unearned discounts; selling of goods below cost; the defamation of competitors by falsely imputing to them dishonorable conduct, inability to perform contracts, questionable credit standing, or other false representations; false and untrue advertising; misrepresentation in the sale of goods; the imitation of trade-marks, trade names, slogans, or other marks of identification of competitors, having the tendency and capacity to mislead or deceive purchasers; price discrimination; marked-up or fictitious prices; false invoicing. The acceptance of orders at special-quantity prices other than for a definite quantity of goods placed in one order and at the option of the seller to be forwarded in one shipment was condemned by the industry. The rules also provided for the publication of prices and terms, and provided definitions of a jobber and a dealer, and condemned the sale of any product of the industry under any form of guaranty against both advance and protection against decline in the price of products.

I am not a lawyer, but on opinion from competent counsel I challenge anyone to successfully show that these rules in any way violate the law or lend themselves to any scheme of price fixing or similar illicit scheme.

Further, the prices of the commodities of this industry were not raised to the public after the trade-practice conference. If anything, they have decreased. Competition is as keen as ever, but far more decent and less expensive. Above all, however, I earnestly direct your attention to the fact that this conference lasted only a single day, with practically no expense to the Government. It accomplished through voluntary cooperation what it would have taken years of time and thousands of dollars to accomplish by the compulsory process of complaint, trial, and order.

Therefore any attempt to put a rider on an appropriation bill prohibiting the commission from using funds to carry out this great constructive work simply means that Congress is thereby encouraging the crook to continue violating the law until stopped by the slow and uncertain process of prosecution.

I have examined other conference rules, particularly the rules for the cottonseed industry, and I think I see the origin of all the fuss raised on this floor by Mr. PATMAN. One of the cottonseed rules requires the crushers to publish the price paid for cottonseed. Another limits to $3 per ton the commission paid by the crushers for the purchase of such seed. This informs the farmer that if the crusher is paying, say $30, he can obtain $27 a ton for his seed.

I can find no rule which limits the $6 profit per ton, which I understand is at times exacted from the farmer by some dealers who buy seed from the farmer and sell them to the crushers. However, if as a result of these rules the farmer is informed that he can get $27 a ton he will refuse to sell to a dealer or middleman at $24 a ton. Therefore the rules save to the farmer many thousands of dollars annually, which in the absence of the rules would go into the pockets of a certain class of dealers.

A recent report by the Federal Trade Commission shows that the products of cottonseed are in competition with lard and other commodities and this competition sets the price; thus, if the price of lard is high the products of cottonseed take its place. If the price of hogs is low, the public will buy lard. Unless cottonseed products are sold at a correspondingly low price there is no demand for them. This report by the commission also shows that the margin between the sales price of the products of cottonseed and the purchase price paid by the crushers for cottonseed is not unreasonable but is fair.

I am further informed that neither the price of cottonseed products nor the margin between the price of the products and the price of the seed has increased since the holding of the trade-practice conference.

This cottonseed conference was presided over by Commissioner McCulloch, a distinguished and highly respected lawyer, who for 20 years presided as justice of the Supreme Court of the State of Arkansas and who himself is a raiser and seller of cottonseed.

The rules of the petroleum industry have also attracted much attention. Sufficient to say that in a case brought by the Attorney General in the California circuit the petroleum rules were squarely before and considered by the United States district court, a consent decree resulted, and while the respondents were enjoined by that decree from doing certain things, they were not enjoined from carrying out their agreement to abide by the rules.

I venture the opinion that the suit brought by the attorney general of Texas involving these same rules will result in like manner, as did the cases in Massachusetts, in Alabama, and in Louisiana, all of which petered out.

I am informed that over 16,000 concerns doing business in all sections of the United States have signed acceptances and agreements to abide by these petroleum rules.

In an official statement recently made by Chairman Humphrey, of the Federal Trade Commission, a number of illustrations of what has been accomplished through trade-pactice conferences are given thus:

It is well within the facts to say that through fraudulent advertising in the newspapers and magazines alone the people of this country are defrauded of not less than $750,000,000 annually. The Post Office Department, the Department of Justice, the Agriculture Department, and the Federal Trade Commission continually waged war against these frauds, but the result was disappointing. Fraudulent advertising seemed to be increasing rather than diminishing. Through the efforts of some of the publishers working with the Federal Trade Commission, a trade-practice conference was called, and at this conference the representatives of over 6,000 magazines—and many of the leading newspapers of the country—were represented. After a full and fair discussion of the evils of this false advertising to the honest competitor and to the public, the representatives of these publications unanimously adopted a rule to the effect that they would employ the most effective agency that they could secure to examine the advertisements offered for publication and to advise them as to their fairness.

This pledge made to each other they have faithfully carried out with the assistance, when necessary, of the Federal Trade Commission. The result of this conference has been that fraudulent advertising since its holding has been decreased in the country over 50 per cent. Many of the worst classes of advertisements, such as patent-medicine remedies, hair restorers, antifat remedies, puzzle contests, etc., have been decreased from 75 to 90 per cent. As a direct result of the holding of this conference the people of this country have been saved from being robbed of at least $250,000,000 annually, and this vast sum came largely from the poor, the ignorant, and the afflicted and unfortunate. I do not hesitate to say that as a result of this one trade-practice conference alone more fraudulent advertising has been suppressed and more honest competitors protected and the public more greatly benefited than by all other plans put together which the Government has ever tried.

* * * The trade-practice conference is part of the policy of cooperation, and a big part of it, that the Federal Trade Commission has had in effect for the last several years, and it is a conservative estimate, fully sustained by our records, that under this policy of cooperation during the last year more has been done to protect the public and the honest competitor, and that more crooks and scoundrels have been driven out of business and more unfair and fraudulent practices ended, than was done in the 11 years combined under the old system of litigation.

The same statement announces that due to the trade-practice conference in the furniture industry, fraud in interstate commerce in that industry has been practically eliminated. Nine hundred and fifty manufacturers accepted and agreed to abide by these rules.

It is also said that the trade-practice conference in the fur industry saves the women and girls of this country—mostly of the poorer class—from being defrauded of $75,000,000 annually.

A discriminatory practice resulting from using New York as a basing point for the shipping of shirting fabrics was completely abandoned after a conference was held for that industry. Prior to this conference shirting fabric shipped from New England or from the South was delivered in New York without charge for either freight or drayage. Shirting fabric shipped to any other city in the United States was subject to a freight charge and drayage charge. This practice was regarded as discriminatory, because charges were made for freight that exceeded the amount of freight actually paid. To correct this evil the rule adopted by the industry provided for the shipment of all shirting fabric f. o. b. point of origin. This rule follows the doctrine in the Pittsburg Plus case—Docket 760—and others involving the same principle.

There has been much misinformation concerning the attitude of the Department of Justice toward the trade-practice conference, and in that connection I quote from the address of Hon. John Lord O'Brian, assistant to the Attorney General of the United States, made at the Mayflower Hotel on May 2, 1930:

The Federal Trade Commission * * * has jurisdiction to investigate unlawful practices and to enforce provisions of the Clayton Act. In the exercise of its jurisdiction to deal with unfair practices the commission has not confined its activities to investigations and prosecutions, but in the desire to aid business has developed the practice of holding conferences. Out of this has come the Federal trade-practice conference which, started as an experiment, has now become recognized as a valuable institution. The Department of Justice has no hostility to the Federal trade-practice conferences. On the contrary, it approves these conferences and believes that within their legitimate field they afford valuable opportunity for education and for constructive progress in industry. It also recognizes that these conferences belong to the province of the Federal Trade Commission, with whose activities the department has not interfered and with whose aims it is in harmony.

Likewise Attorney General Mitchell in an address before the Law School Association of the University of Minnesota at Minneapolis on April 15, 1931, said:

You have often seen statements made that the Department of Justice has been attacking in the courts some trade association's code of rules, that have been approved either by the Federal Trade Commission or by the department itself in years gone by. There has been no case where such an assertion was justified. If we have assailed any trade association operating under rules approved by the Federal Trade Commission it has been because the association has been distorting its rules or going beyond them and doing acts which the Trade Commission never approved or considered, and when you next read a statement that the department is assailing in the courts some practice previously approved in the Department of Justice accept the statement with a grain of salt. * * * As I understand it, the action of the department and the commission is directed at putting a stop to trade association practices claimed to be in accordance with rules approved by a public authority but which, in fact, go beyond anything which any governmental agency has accepted as lawful.

I ask that anyone interested in this work examine the practices described and condemned by more than 140 industries, and if any man who examines these can say that the elimination of such practices does not improve industry and benefit the public through the stricter observance of law, then he must realize that he is not in sympathy with law enforcement, is not interested in the public welfare, and does not desire business prosperity.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I introduced a bill, H. R. 10017, entitled "A bill to raise additional revenue," which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The bill provides for the legalization of beer containing alcohol not over 2.75 per cent by weight, and would raise at least $500,000,000 in taxes, as contrasted with the proposed sales tax, which would raise a similar amount.

If the Committee on Ways and Means, after considering the matter, does not report the bill favorably within 30 days, which will expire about April 7, a petition to discharge that committee from further consideration of the bill will be filed at the desk. When 145 signatures have been attached to that petition the matter will be brought up, and it is anticipated that the vote will be had on April 25. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a speech delivered by Hon. Thomas B. Reed in 1886, then celebrating the birth of the town of Portland, Me. This being its tercentenary, I should like permission to insert this speech in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I am obliged to object.

DISTRIBUTION OF GOVERNMENT-OWNED WHEAT

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I call up a privileged resolution (H. Res. 164) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina calls up a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House Resolution 164

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution, it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 110, authorizing the distribution of Government-owned wheat to the American National Red Cross and other organizations for relief of distress.

That after general debate, which shall be confined to the resolution and shall continue not to exceed two hours—to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Agriculture—the resolution shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule.

At the conclusion of the reading of the resolution for amendment the committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the resolution and any amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] about the time for general debate?

Mr. MICHENER. There is no disposition on this side to oppose the rule. However, there are numerous requests for time, and I would suggest the usual 30 minutes.

Mr. POU. Very well. I will yield to the gentleman from Michigan 30 minutes of the one hour, to be in turn yielded by him as he sees fit.

Mr. Speaker, before proceeding I ask unanimous consent that the substitute amendment recommended by the Committee on Agriculture may be considered as an original bill for the purpose of amendment, during the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 110 in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself five minutes.

The special rule provides for the consideration of a resolution which allocates 40,000,000 bushels of wheat to the Red Cross to be used by the Red Cross in alleviating distress wherever it may find it proper to use the wheat.

Under ordinary conditions I could not support such a measure; but we are confronted, as everyone knows, by an unparalleled condition throughout the country. We have an abundance of food and yet there is widespread hunger. We have a great surplus of all the necessaries of life and yet no man living was ever confronted by such a condition. God grant that these times may pass; but we must deal with them as they are.

This situation was described centuries ago by a Roman writer or orator, if I remember, as "inops inter optima"—we are poor amid great riches.

This resolution needs no apology. The Government must exert itself to relieve the distress whenever it can. There is no alternative. With all our human shortcomings, we have the best Government the world has ever seen. [Applause.] Perhaps there will be other measures that the Congress will be called upon to consider to appease hunger and relieve distress. We must all pursue a course in this dark hour which will stimulate the love of the American people for the flag. We must see to it, as far as we can, that there is no starving deserving American anywhere in the Nation; above all, women and children must not be permitted to go hungry. We are told by the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture that in the course of time this 155,000,000 bushels of wheat will exhaust itself. It is costing 18 cents per bushel per annum to cover the carrying charges—insurance and storage.

So in the course of two or three years the entire value of the wheat will be absorbed by the carrying charges. Therefore when we allocate these 40,000,000 bushels of wheat we are relieving the Government of a costly burden.

While under ordinary circumstances I could not support such a measure, I will vote for this resolution with the very greatest pleasure, without apology to anyone, and I believe an overwhelming majority of the House will ratify the action of the Committee on Agriculture and the action of the Senate. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, within less than 10 hours after the Lindbergh child was kidnaped the same organization of criminals and murderers existing throughout the length and breadth of our land kidnaped a bright young boy 11 years old as he was on his way to school, in the city of Niles, Ohio, which is in my congressional district. Like Colonel and Mrs. Lindbergh there is to-day another father and mother, with loving hearts and tearful eyes, wondering what will become of their boy.

My purpose at this time is to urge that Congress take prompt and drastic action in passing a bill now before it providing the extreme penalty for crimes of this character. The damnable crimes of kidnaping within the last 48 hours emphasize the need of legislation which will make punishable by death such atrocious felonies.

To-day the Federal Government exercises its power to regulate interstate commerce in industry and business, and it is the duty of Congress to see to it that the criminal and the murderer, engaged in the blackest of crimes, be made to suffer the extreme penalty.

I am wondering how much longer our Federal and State Governments are going to permit the criminal and racketeer to defy the authorities and the law of our land. To-day we see them in their high-powered automobiles, equipped with smoke screens, armed with machine guns, driving down our main thoroughfares at a speed exceeding 60 miles an hour and shooting down and killing innocent people who are walking the streets. How much longer are we, a great civilized Nation, going to permit such conditions to exist? According to newspaper reports of a short time ago it has almost gotten to the point where they can not hold a funeral in Chicago unless Mr. Capone and his gang approve of it.

So I appeal to this House and say that this is the time when we should take some drastic action to stop the criminal activities of the kidnapers in our country. [Applause.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, no one deplores the crime of kidnaping any more than I do. I deplore it just as much as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER], but I also deplore the statement he has made about the city of Chicago. I fully realize that kidnaping, especially that which has just taken place a few days ago, is a heinous crime and that there is no punishment severe enough for it; but, Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen, libel and slander are also crimes and should be punished severely, because they cause much more damage and harm than is generally supposed. Though no Member can be punished for uttering any slanderous statements on the floor of the House, I feel, nevertheless, that it is manifestly unfair and unjust to attack and slander the city of Chicago as was done by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] and by other Members at various times, especially in view of the fact that ever since the spring of 1931 when a new, yes, a Democratic administration had taken hold of the affairs of the city, every effort has been made to eliminate crime and bring about law and order.

Due to the undue publicity given to Chicago in years gone by and to statements made on the floor of this House, people, not only in our country but the world over, have been led to believe that it is the most lawless city in America, though the truth is that there are 32 cities in the United States which have a higher percentage of crime in proportion to population than this much-maligned city of Chicago. There are at least three cities in the gentleman's State—Ohio—whose crime rating is higher than ours.

Consequently, I can not help growing disgusted listening to the unjustifiable attacks on Chicago, which, I believe, is the greatest city in the entire world. Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen, I wish to assure you that everything humanly possible is being done to improve conditions, but so long as the crime-breeding prohibition law remains on our statute books, that long will it be impossible to eliminate crime and restore the law and order that prevailed in our city and in our county before the adoption of prohibition.

Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen, if only one-half of the money that we appropriate and that is wasted by the Prohibition Bureau were utilized for the elimination of crime great progress would be made against the criminal element of our Nation. It is unfortunate, but nevertheless true, that the prohibition law brought about a disrespect not only for the prohibition law itself but for all of our laws, and therefore I repeat that we can not expect much improvement in the prevailing conditions until this law is repealed. [Applause.]

In conclusion permit me to say that the Department of Justice should immediately give instructions, if it has not already done so—and I doubt very much that it has—to every field officer, agent, and inspector to devote all of his or her energy and effort to aid other officers apprehend those guilty of these outrageous abductions; and that hereafter the prohibition officers should be requested, as agents of our Government, to devote their time and energy in eliminating crime and not in centering their efforts on finding out whether or not some citizen may have partaken of a glass of beer or, perchance, a glass of wine. I am fully in accord with the statement of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] that we should eliminate crime from our midst. But, I repeat, this can not be done until the cause for the crime is eliminated. Therefore I shall look forward in the near future to seeing some favorable action taken on the bill legalizing beer that has been agreed upon by the wets of this House.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. The gentleman from Ohio was not attacking the people of Chicago. He was only mentioning on the floor of the House what he read in the headlines of our newspapers a few weeks ago to the effect that these criminals stopped funeral processions in the city of Chicago.

Mr. SABATH. Oh, we read many things in the newspapers which we can not always take for granted. The newspapermen like to print things which will attract attention. In that I do not blame them; but I do hope that from now on they will print, and you will state, the facts as they exist and thus help us reestablish the good name of Chicago by giving it just credit for its great accomplishments.

Mr. KARCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. KARCH. Is it not a fact that the Attorney General, who favors the expenditure of these millions for the enforcement of the prohibition law, has made a specific recommendation against the enactment of a law giving the Government of the United States jurisdiction in the apprehension of that kind of violator?

Mr. SABATH. So I understand; it is to be regretted that more attention is being paid by the Department of Justice to minor offenses, which are in reality no offenses whatever, and that no attention is being paid to the eradication of the actual crime in the Nation. Now, as to the resolution before us. I am in favor of this resolution. I believe that the hungry people of the land should be fed, and I shall vote for the resolution; but once more I call the attention of the country to the fact that the hungry people in the large communities and in the large cities are entitled to some relief. I am willing to help the farmer and relieve the starving people in the rural sections, but, my God, is it not time that something should be done for the hundreds of thousands of starving people in the large cities of the United States? [Applause.]

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, this resolution in the form it came from the Senate was originally prepared by Representative CHRISTOPHERSON, of South Dakota, and introduced on January 28, 1931, as House Joint Resolution 266, and in the form in which it was recently presented to the committee was a bill which was introduced as a joint resolution in the Senate and House by both Senators from South Dakota and all three Members of the House.

The reasons for its introduction and for insistence on its passage I expect to state in two or three minutes.

Divine Providence has grievously afflicted the people of a large part of South Dakota. In the entire State, with the exception of a few counties, there was practically no rainfall in the crop year of 1931, and what little crop did develop was taken away by a horde or a plague of grasshoppers until in 30 counties of that State no more crop was raised than could be raised on the top of this table at my right. When a little corn was cut and a few weeds had grown up, the farmers of that territory cut the weeds and the corn and tried to carry their cattle over with it, but found it had no food value. At that the cattle might have survived, but a sleet storm came along which froze on the grass that had grown up after the grasshoppers had left. On top of that there came 2 feet of snow, until the cattle now are actually starving, and are being killed in some counties of the State. Within the last four days, in addition to this, this 2 feet of snow has melted rapidly, and they are now facing a flood.

These five catastrophes would not happen all in one crop season once in a generation. If this bill is not enacted and the wheat is not made available, there will be any number of head of livestock that will perish, and this western country will be compelled to begin over again without the livestock that is necessary on a farm.

Undoubtedly, much of this wheat can be used in the cities where there is distress, and I approve of the amendments that have been made to the original resolution by the Committee on Agriculture. It is regrettable that the State of South Dakota has not so changed its constitution that it could meet an emergency of this kind, as was so well called to the attention of the committee by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CLARKE]; and I believe that the States of the United States must change their constitutions so they can meet this sort of an emergency. [Applause.] It can not be met to-day in the State of South Dakota because of a constitutional provision written a great many years ago, and therefore this legislation is the only method of relief that we can have.

The governor of the State asked an opinion from the supreme court of the State, as he was entitled to do under our statutes, and they construed in advance the constitution.

I urge, for the protection of these people who have suffered so much, due to no fault of their own, that this resolution be passed, that the people of the State be enabled to save a few head of livestock, the few head of horses and cattle that they have, so they can again pick up in 1932 the threads of existence which have been so disorganized by acts of nature.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. How soon can this wheat be made available in these cases?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. It can be made available at once because there is approximately 1,500,000 bushels of this wheat in five elevators contiguous to or in the area where it is needed.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. The quicker the better.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. It could be done day after to-morrow if the bill were signed by the President to-day, because of the availability of the wheat, some of which is stored in the area affected, and the rest of the wheat needed could be brought in from Sioux City and Omaha and Minneapolis, where it is stored, very shortly.

I may say that the railroads of the State have offered to carry this wheat from the elevators in the State to the places where it is needed, and they deserve every credit for the action they have taken in this regard.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I know of nothing more desirable than a fine and delicate sense of humor, such as we will say is possessed by our President. The press a few days ago reported a conversation which he had had with a caller in which he told what he said was a good joke on Governor Pinchot of Pennsylvania. Pinchot had been agitating around here, he said, in favor of Federal aid for the starving; and the joke was that, of the funds that he required to provide the aid through taxation, Pennsylvania would contribute 13 per cent of the total, whereas in the distribution of the aid Pennsylvania, by reason of its population, would receive only 9 per cent, so that the governor was advocating taking 13 per cent from his people and giving back only 9 per cent. It was said that the President chuckled over his joke.

Now, the President would have had Pinchot on the hip if the 13 per cent was to be taken away from the same people that the 9 per cent was given back to, but it just so happened that that was not the fact. The 13 per cent was to be taken away from the rich income-tax payers, which did not include the hundreds of thousands of starving Pennsylvanians. The tax was to be taken from the Mellons and others of their class, but the aid was to be given to such as the thousands of starving miners in Washington County, Pa.

It would still have been a good joke, apart from this fact, if the money had been taken away from a particular class that Pinchot represented and had been distributed to a class that Pinchot did not represent. It would have been an excellent joke on the President had he been Governor of Pennsylvania, if, in his anxiety over the interests of rich men and propertied classes, he is able to forget the sorrow and despair of those who are starving. But it was not much of a joke on Pinchot.

It is usual to find public men advocating the interests of those who have supported them. It is usual to find them with a convenient set of principles which respond to the interests and desire of the classes that the public man represents. Where you find a public man representing wealth and power, you usually find him with a set of principles which forbid the doing of anything which will militate against the interest of that class. [Applause.]

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, you have listened to several speeches to-day denouncing the recent kidnaping of Lindbergh's baby boy. I do not propose to use any time to defend any kind of crime, and particularly the most horrible and fiendish of all, kidnaping. But, I can say to you that as long as the American people are hungry and starving you are going to have all kinds of crime. [Applause.] It must be self-evident to you that those who are starving and have children at home who are undernourished will do a great many things that they would not do in violation of law in normal times.

The bill we are considering for the undernourished and starving will do a great deal to relieve the crime wave. I congratulate the Committee on Agriculture and the Committee on Rules for reporting out this bill to afford relief to millions of Americans who are unemployed and in need through no fault of their own.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Will the gentleman yield? Does the gentleman understand the real purport of this bill is not to relieve human beings but starving cattle?

Mr. FISH. That may be the gentleman's view of it but it is not the view of the Members of the House. This is to relieve human misery, and if we have anything left we can give it to the starving cattle. This is the first bill reported out of the Committee on Agriculture or any other committee of the House controlled by the Democratic Party to relieve human suffering in the United States. I want to congratulate those Democrats, like Representative LUDLOW, of Indiana, Representative LONERGAN, of Connecticut, and those Republicans, such as Representatives CAMPBELL, of Iowa, CLANCY, of Michigan, and LAGUARDIA, of New York, who have been advocating and fighting for similar legislation for the last two or three months. The bill should have been reported out on the first week of January, when a practically identical bill came over from the Senate by a unanimous vote authorizing the distribution of 40,000,000 bushels of wheat through the Red Cross after it had been processed into flour.

The only trouble with this bill is that it should have been reported and acted on two months ago, when Senator CAPPER'S bill came over to the House and was referred to the Committee on Agriculture. The economic conditions in the country were the same then as now, and there were then millions of American people unemployed and in need and on the verge of starvation. Why the delay? If it is a good measure now, it was equally so two months ago. I have been much amused by the antics of some of the members of the Committee on Agriculture, Democrats and Republicans alike, who have been obliged to eat crow and are now rushing to board the band wagon.

When I raised the issue just a week ago on the floor of the House and had a controversy with the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture I was denounced as a demagogue.

I suppose the gentleman of Texas's interpretation of demagogue is a Republican who asks the Democrats in the House to assume responsibility for legislation and report out measures such as this, aimed to relieve human misery. If that is a correct interpretation, then I admit and assume the charge.

This bill will do a great deal to immediately provide bread for millions upon millions of undernourished American men, women, and children. It will take care of 10,000,000 people, as far as bread is concerned, for the next 10 months. It is a disgrace and an outrage that this country of ours, with an overabundance of foodstuffs, should permit millions of our own people to continue to be undernourished and hungry. In the big cities of the country, and particularly in the colored districts, there has been virtual starvation. Fifty per cent of the colored people in New York, Detroit, Philadelphia, and Chicago have been unemployed and have been virtually starving. I received a letter to-day from a banker in Harlem, who stated that " some relief has come to Harlem this winter as a result of the general drive for the unemployed, but 50 per cent of negro families are wholly or partly unemployed and relief has been possible for only about 10 per cent. Whole families that are starving, sick, and in despair; hundreds of men who need courage to 'hold on'; children who need protection as they have never needed it." The same situation applies to white people in great industrial cities. This bill alone will afford relief to millions of American citizens at no cost to the Government of the United States. The passage of this measure will not cost the taxpayers a penny but will save them $6,000,000 instead. As a matter of fact, it saves the storage on 40,000,000 bushels of wheat, for which we have been paying 15 cents per bushel per year. We have also been paying Canada $2,500,000 for storage of our surplus wheat in Canadian granaries. If there are those who want to vote against this bill, let them vote against it, but let them know the facts, and let them not say that they voted for this bill on compulsion and are ashamed of it. This is not a dole, this is not unemployment insurance, this bill carries out a fundamental principle of all government and the reason for government and is above and beyond the Constitution, and that is the duty to feed our people and not let them starve in serious depressions and in great emergencies. Any other course would be a national disgrace, particularly when our Government is engaged in hoarding an enormous surplus of wheat. The following letter from a gentleman in Minneapolis is an indication of the viewpoint of the Middle West on the bill before the House. I do not believe that the record vote in the House will show that the Members are any longer hopelessly divided.

Hon. HAMILTON FISH,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. FISH: It is with the greatest pleasure that I learn from press reports that you are insisting on the consideration by the House of a resolution for the appropriation of 40,000,000 bushels of Farm Board wheat for distribution through relief agencies to our millions of hungry unemployed, regardless of the unfavorable action by the Committee on Agriculture recently.

While sentiment is hopelessly divided as to the wisdom and propriety of Congress appropriating money for this purpose, there is almost unanimous approval for the movement being pushed by you, and I want to say if Congress really wants to do something for the needy, it should rally and put over this appropriation.

It will not only be a god-send for so large a number of our people, but will give employment to the elevators and mills in loading and grinding of this wheat, and will produce considerable revenue for our harassed railroads and be the means of reducing our burdensome surplus, and I sincerely wish you every success, as I feel it is no time to be quibbling about the dole and precedent when confined to wheat with no market, and with prices about one-half the cost of production.

Sincerely yours,

W. H. BOWKER.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON].

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Mr. Speaker, I never thought it would be my duty to ask for aid for the people of my State, as we are asking for in this measure. South Dakota, generally known as the Sunshine State, is a highly productive agricultural area of our country, producing, as a general rule, crops in abundance. I have lived in the State for over 40 years, and during that time I have never seen a situation such as prevails there at this time. It seems that nature played against us. There were a number of years preceding with insufficient moisture, and these were climaxed by a year of extreme drought in 1931. The meager crops which we did raise last year were consumed by the grasshoppers, leaving the State almost wholly without a supply of food for livestock. Then to add to the burden, late in November we had a light snowfall, followed by warm weather which melted the snow.

Then came cold weather which formed a coating of ice over what grass remained on the plains. That was followed by deep snow, in some places as much as 3 feet, and extreme cold weather. The result was livestock perishing because of lack of food. The American Red Cross came in and has been rendering wonderful help. Their first purpose, of course, was to aid the people who needed food, but observing the situation, and realizing the distress among the farmers and their inability to take care of their livestock, they made an exception, enlarged upon their activities, and have been supplying feed for the farmers so far as their resources permitted. They have rendered wonderful aid to the distressed farmers in this unusually severe winter.

The people of South Dakota have not laid down on the job and looked entirely to outside help. They have contributed liberally in the towns and in the cities to the relief fund, and have done all that they could in aiding the Red Cross in supplying food and feed; but the situation is one beyond their ability to take care of, and without some help of this kind thousands of head of stock will perish before the grass is available in the spring.

It does not seem to me that the allocating of this wheat to the Red Cross to aid in this relief program will cost the Government anything. This wheat is being absorbed by storage and insurance charges at the rate of 18 cents per bushel per year, and it is my belief that the quicker this surplus wheat can be disposed of and cleared out of the elevators, the better off we will all be, especially so the wheat-producing farmer. The question may come to some of you—the one touched upon by my colleague, Mr. JOHNSON—why the State can not issue bonds to take care of this situation? The State has sought to do that, but because of provisions in our State constitution can not do so. When our constitution was written 40 years ago there was strong sentiment for constitutional restrictions, and there was written into it many specific limitations which are still there. The Supreme Court advised our governor, in an advisory opinion, that the legislature would have no authority, in view of the restrictions in our constitution to authorize the issue of any bonds for the purpose of purchasing feed for stock. But for these provisions of our constitution the governor would have called the legislature of our State into session to take care of the matter on the State's credit, which is good. I am expressing the hope that not only the rule now under consideration but also the Senate resolution may be adopted, so that the quantity of wheat stated, or so much as need be, may be turned over to the American Red Cross to aid that organization in the splendid service they are carrying on in our State, which will be most helpful in this trying time. It will aid us in an unusual situation brought about by adverse climatic conditions which we could not anticipate and enable our farmers to keep their livestock until spring and feed is available in the pastures.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WHITE].

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, it is with some degree of embarrassment that I rise at this time to look you gentlemen in the face and ask for grain to feed livestock, because in our cities we have had throughout this winter many millions of destitute people. Several weeks ago I introduced a bill similar to this requesting that this wheat be given to the relief of the destitute in the cities, through the Red Cross, with provision that such measures be taken to prevent it coming into competition with the wheat on the market.

I think such a provision could be made, and I think it is justifiable to pass this bill, even if it is in the interest of the livestock, in order that these people may be helped. There are many millions in the cities who have no work and who have no means of obtaining a livelihood at this time except through charity. The Senate demonstrated a few days ago that there was no disposition to use public funds to help these people, despite the fact that the cities were willing to pledge their resources to see that the funds were returned to the Government. If we can help them in this way, let us help them. I am willing that some of this wheat go to the livestock, but let us have some of it for the destitute people in this country who are in desperate need. I appeal to you now in their behalf. [Applause.]

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. LEAVITT].

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, this bill has been very considerably enlarged in its scope since it passed the Senate. It is now a particularly valuable bill toward meeting the crisis which exists.

As the measure was originally introduced it had to do particularly with the situation in the Northwest. I have just learned, in talking with one of the Members, that it is perhaps not generally known that the Red Cross, in a recent statement, included the following words in referring to the drought situation in some of the Northwestern States:

> In the extent of territory and number of persons affected it has been exceeded in the last 10 years only by the Mississippi flood and drought relief operations of 1930–31 in the Southwest.

There have been some sections of the Northwest stricken by three successive years of drought. In other sections, two successive years of drought; so that there has been complete loss of crops. Our drought did not end in a year, as in the Southwest. It became a necessity for the Red Cross, in the praise of which we are sincere, to go into the field and take care of a situation which was, I repeat, in the mind of the Red Cross itself, more severe than all but two similar situations existing in the last 10 years. It involved by no means all of my State, but constituted a tragedy in several counties. My State has responded liberally on its own part, but with the general depression added to by this drought, the burden has been beyond even such sturdy and self-reliant people.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to include the statement of the Red Cross in connection with this situation, in order that my support of this legislation may be fully understood and justified to even the most conservative mind.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

The statement referred to is as follows:

RED CROSS DROUGHT RELIEF IN THE NORTHWEST

By William M. Baxter, jr., manager midwestern area, American Red Cross

Measured in terms of economic loss, the resulting human distress, and the extent and nature of necessary relief operations, the drought in the Northwest represents one of the major disasters of recent years. In the extent of territory and the number of persons affected it has been exceeded in the last 10 years only by the Mississippi flood and drought relief operations of 1930–31 in the Southwest.

The Red Cross began relief operations in Montana and North Dakota during the fall of 1930, following an unprecedented drought of the preceding summer. The situation in the South Dakota-Nebraska area developed in the fall of 1931 as a result of a serious drought during the spring and summer months. A plague of grasshoppers completed the destruction begun by lack of rainfall in this area.

Beginning with the extension of relief to victims of the drought in August, 1930, by a few chapters in Montana and North Dakota, the area of acute distress has steadily expanded as the drought continued, until it includes at the present time 81 counties in the four affected States.

Following conferences with State leadership in Montana and North Dakota last September, a joint campaign presenting the annual roll call and an appeal for drought-relief funds in those States was conducted. Quotas were established by State committees in conference with representatives of this office, and the result of the appeal has been extremely gratifying. Incomplete reports as of January 31 show contributions in North Dakota and Montana of $412,529. The Red Cross has made no special appeal in South Dakota and Nebraska.

As of January 31, 16,875 families, or 79,836 persons, in the four States were receiving Red Cross assistance in food, clothing, fuel, medical supplies, and other necessities, representing an expenditure of $1,203,475.

Anticipating severe weather conditions, the Red Cross furnished thousands of homes in remote sections of Montana and North Dakota with a winter's supply of their primary food needs, such as potatoes, beans, and flour. Replenishing the cellars and pantries of beneficiaries with these necessities strengthened their morale to a remarkable degree.

Through the generosity of farmers, merchants, and manufacturers in North Dakota, Montana, Minnesota, and Wisconsin it has been possible for the Red Cross, through its chapters, to distribute to drought sufferers of the two affected States 356 solid carloads and 209 partially filled cars of donated supplies since this program was launched last October 1. These supplies represent a contribution of approximately $265,539, including the estimated value of free transportation. Of all items contributed, potatoes top the list, 208,104 bushels of them having been moved into the affected area. Two hundred and twenty-five freight cars were required for the potato shipments alone. Other items constituting the bulk of the contributed supplies include apples, 10 cars; beans, 5 cars; flour, 6 cars; sheep, 2 cars; wheat, 1 car; mixed foodstuffs, 113 solid cars and 41 partially filled cars; clothing, 1 solid car and 154 partially filled cars.

Because of the length and severity of the winters in the Montana-North Dakota area, the need for warm clothing, particularly among the children, has been exceptionally large. The first major step toward meeting this need was taken early last fall when a used-clothing campaign was conducted by chapters in these two States. The chapters were assigned quotas which totaled 10,350 children's outfits, divided equally between boys and girls. Before the year ended most of the chapters had reached their goals, but by that time the fury of winter was bearing down. Hundreds of families which until then had withstood the drought's effects were forced to seek Red Cross assistance. When it became apparent that the demand for warm garments would exceed the supply collected, an appeal for knitted garments was sent to chapters in most of the States of the mid-western area. As a result of this action, volunteers in 52 chapters in 13 States produced a total of 23,024 knitted garments for needy children in the Montana-North Dakota area. The entire output included 624 pairs of mittens, 580 pairs of stockings, 684 sweaters, and 412 helmets. Cooperating with the chapters, the national organization furnished 3,196 pounds of yarn for the knitters. Aside from the knitted garments, many chapters outside the drought area, as well as in Montana and North Dakota, have assembled and sent hundreds of layettes and other garments into that area.

Upon the recommendation of Gov. George F. Shafer's State drought relief committee in North Dakota, a new state-wide appeal for used clothing was conducted between January 25 and 30. The donated garments were handled through the relief headquarters in Helena, Mont. In spite of the generous response from these various used-clothing appeals, the donated clothing supplement the garments purchased locally for Red Cross beneficiaries. In December alone, for example, the national organization appropriated $35,850 to meet the clothing needs during that month.

For the purpose of receiving and reconsigning donated supplies, which came in such quantities and assortments as to make it impracticable to route them directly into the drought counties, warehouses were opened last September at Minot, N. Dak., and at Billings, Mont. These warehouses, manned by local personnel, remained open until December 15 and December 21, respectively. In order to handle final shipments of potatoes which were received after all counties in the drought area had been given a supply, a third warehouse was opened at Berthold, N. Dak. Operation of the warehouses made it possible to distribute all donated clothing and foodstuffs in a more efficient manner.

Such a program as the donated-supplies distribution would not have been possible without the cooperation of the railroads. The estimated value of freight service donated by various railroads, hauling the supplies without charge, amounts to more than $100,000. This contribution has been made largely by the Great Northern, Northern Pacific, Soo Line, and Milwaukee Railroads. In addition to handling the supplies without freight charges the railroads have made further contributions toward relief of distress by reduced freight rates on feed for livestock in the stricken counties.

The donated-supplies campaign is only supplementary to the organization's general drought program. In accordance with its usual disaster methods the Red Cross purchases the greater part of needed supplies locally, thereby stimulating business among the merchants of every county in which distress exists.

In the summer of 1931 the United States Indian Bureau was confronted with a major problem resulting from the distress of Indians on or adjacent to reservations in the drought area. The appropriations by the bureau for relief were exhausted and no further funds were available until appropriations had been made by the Congress. The Red Cross agreed to assist the Indian Bureau in dealing with this phase of the drought problem, and accordingly has appropriated $130,600, which is being expended by the Indian Bureau for the relief of Indian families.

These figures, including direct expenditures by the Red Cross for family relief, and the appropriation to the Indian Bureau for the relief of Indians in the drought areas, show a total expenditure by the Red Cross as of January 31 of $1,334,075, and the distribution of donated supplies valued at $265,539.

The following statement shows the case load in the four States as of January 31, exclusive of Indians being aided through the Indian Bureau:

	Families receiving assistance	Persons receiving assistance	Number of persons aided to date
Montana	5,929	28,162	41,219
North Dakota	7,070	33,583	47,440
South Dakota	2,631	11,817	14,399
Nebraska	1,245	6,274	6,603
Total	16,875	79,836	109,661

Following approval by the Department of Agriculture in August, 1931, of the extension of Government loans for the purchase of feed for livestock to farmers within the recognized drought counties, such assistance was extended to 18,584 farmers in the four States, amounting to $3,669,640.

During the latter part of January, 1932, the severe winter weather with heavy snows throughout the Nebraska-South Dakota area seriously increased the problems of farmers attempting to carry livestock through the winter with inadequate feed supplies, and extensive loss of livestock dying from starvation was reported. Following receipt of reports of these conditions, the Department of Agriculture approved Government loans from the unexpended balance of the 1931 $20,000,000 agricultural rehabilitation fund for the purchase of feed for livestock. In both Nebraska and South Dakota State and local campaigns are under way for the purpose of securing volunteer contributions for the purchase of stock feed, to be distributed through Red Cross chapters in the drought counties. These campaigns are not being conducted by the Red Cross, but the chapters are cooperating with the different agencies sponsoring the effort. In addition to the above, the Governor of Nebraska has been sponsoring, in cooperation with the American Legion, a State campaign for the collection of foodstuffs and stock feed which are being distributed in the drought counties through the governor's own committee.

Following the peak of relief activity in February, it is expected that the relief load will be materially decreased in the spring months. By early summer the Government crop-production loans from the $50,000,000 fund available for that purpose will have been made, gardens will have matured, and crops to be harvested in the fall of 1932 will be in the ground.

The service being given on all sides by Red Cross volunteers, State officials, organizations, and others interested in the welfare of those affected is outsanding. In January 1,650 Montanans and North Dakotans and 1,073 citizens of South Dakota and Nebraska were serving the Red Cross as volunteer workers in the interest of their stricken neighbors. These figures include only those regularly engaged in the relief operation. It must be remembered that additional hundreds in each State have given some time to the program in past months.

Mr. LEAVITT. I refer to this briefly because it shows a solid foundation for the sincere interest in this bill of those of us who represent the Northwestern States. But in addition to any special interest, our support is much broader in its sympathy than any local application. We realized fully what a condition of unemployment exists throughout the United States as a whole. We favor the increased relief to the distressed of the entire country that is carried in this bill as it comes from the House committee. We will unanimously vote in favor of the enactment of the legislation as it is now drawn.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I have been more or less familiar with this legislation since it was first introduced in the Senate several weeks ago. As far as I know, there is no opposition on either side of the aisle to the enactment of it. The only regret I have is that it was not brought into the House three or four weeks ago in order that we might have given worthy, needy people the benefit of this free wheat at an earlier date.

As a usual proposition I should not be in favor of giving away wheat which belongs to the Government; but under the extraordinary situation which exists throughout the country at the present time, from the actual poverty that exists in the centers of population, and also, to a more or less extent, in the country districts, I do not believe it is possible for us to do anything better than to pass this law and give the Red Cross an opportunity to distribute this wheat. As I understand it, the Red Cross is perfectly willing to assume this obligation.

As far as the cattle in the northwestern part of the United States are concerned, I feel that probably that is just as important as anything else, because it has a very direct bearing on the prosperity of the people themselves. If we do not take care of the cattle at this time we may have to take care of the people themselves at a later season of the year.

Furthermore, we will save some money, because we can not sell this wheat without breaking the market, and, as I understand, it costs 1½ cents per month per bushel to carry it. The sooner we distribute it and give the people the benefit of it the better it will be.

A question has been raised by one or two Members relative to a limit of time when this wheat should be available. As suggested in the bill, it is "from time to time." It seems to me we ought not to leave this an indefinite period, and it would be better, in the consideration of the bill, if we should provide some limitation. For instance, at any time prior to May 1, 1933. It does not seem that it would be necessary to go further than this winter and perhaps next winter. I hope the Committee on Agriculture, when we come to consider this bill, will consider such an amendment.

Mr. GLOVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. GLOVER. I understand an amendment of that kind will be offered by the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. SNELL. I am very glad to hear that. I think the best thing we can do is to enact this into law and give the people the benefit of it at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do I understand the gentleman from North Carolina offered an amendment to the rule as originally introduced?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asked unanimous consent to consider the committee amendment as an original proposition.

Mr. STAFFORD. Was that reported by the Clerk?

The SPEAKER. That was agreed to before debate on this rule began.

Mr. STAFFORD. I believe the proposed amendment was not reported.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asked unanimous consent that an amendment proposed by the Committee on Agriculture be considered as an original proposition for the purpose of offering amendments in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the House gave that consent.

The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 110, authorizing the distribution of Government-owned wheat to the American National Red Cross and other organizations for relief of distress.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 110, with Mr. BLAND in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the resolution.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the resolution be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, we are living in rather strange times. We have a surplus of practically every commodity of any consequence, both industrial and agricultural, and yet we have a great deal of distress in America. I am an optimist in so far as our country is concerned, but it is certainly true that we have had a few kinks in our system of distribution.

At the present time the Stabilization Corporation of the Federal Farm Board has 155,000,000 bushels of wheat. It is costing, including interest, storage, and insurance, 18 cents per bushel to carry this wheat. At the present price of wheat it will eat itself up, even if the weevils let it alone, in about two and a half years. The Farm Board has announced a policy of not selling more than 5,000,000 bushels per month. The taking of this wheat will leave 115,000,000 bushels in the hands of the Stabilization Corporation. It will take two years to dispose of that at the present rate of disposal. If we await that period before beginning to dispose of the 40,000,000 bushels every cent of its value will be absorbed in the carrying charges. This takes it out of the realm of the dole and makes it more like the situation of a man having an old suit of clothes or an old coat that he has no use for and that some one else needs very much.

As a general proposition, of course, no one would favor a measure of this kind, but there are crises in every nation's life as in every individual's life.

A nation is made up of people. If you want to know what makes this Nation great you will not find it out by examining the machinery of government, the Capitol, the Congress, or the courts, but go up into the hills of New England and out on the prairies of the West and into the cotton fields of the South, where there are folks, just plain honest homespun folks, who act squarely, deal fairly, and who serve their country in peace and in war. [Applause.] These make a nation. Destroy the American machinery of government and the American people will built it up in three days, but destroy the morale and stamina of our people and the Capitol and machinery will be but empty symbols. [Applause.]

There is a human side to this question. The greatest, the richest, and most powerful nation in the world can not afford to have citizens who are willing to work, who are loyal, and who have fought its battles walking its streets hungry. [Applause.] I had hoped the discussion to-day would be free from partisanship.

I am willing to give the gentleman from New York such credit as may be his due, but I notice his effort to unload the blame for the seeming delay on this proposition on the Democratic Party. I want to say that the Agricultural Committee of the House is composed of many members who are anxious to do their duty, who will listen to testimony, who will act reasonably, and have almost always acted without partisanship, or, at least, with little partisanship. In my judgment, it is a great committee. I am proud of the record it is making. But waving aside the question of which party is responsible for getting us into the state in which we find ourselves and which makes this sort of legislation necessary, I want to state that while the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] conducts himself well and makes a good presentation as long as he sticks to his facts, when the gentleman leaves this field and indulges his political imagination it is an entirely different story. On political questions the gentleman from New York thinks he is right, as he always does, but, as a matter of fact, he is wrong, as he usually is. [Applause.]

The fight against bringing this legislation out at an earlier date was made by a Member of his own party, and even though that party, in so far as governmental policies have affected the situation, is responsible for present conditions, if that party in the committee not only had not assumed any responsibility but had refrained from voting, the Democrats would have voted it out a month ago. [Applause.] The record will show that. That much in answer to the gentleman from New York. I am not bringing up party matters, but I am making the statement to the committee that the Democrats would have voted it out more than 2 to 1 a month ago. Those are the facts.

Gentlemen, that is merely beside the issue. I had hoped no one would undertake to bring politics into this matter. This is a matter, I am sure, in which every Member of this House is vitally interested.

We have this wheat. It is deteriorating. I do not see any reason on earth why the American Government can not show that warmth of spirit which will at least enable it to discard an old and worthless garment in order to see that its citizens do not suffer from hunger and are not kept in misery and want. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself two minutes. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I think it is but fair to say to the committee as a whole that while a few weeks ago some evidence was presented as to the general necessity for legislation of this sort that the critical situation in the Northwest which brings the action of the committee before you to-day was not presented until within the last two or three days. Upon that evidence, which was compelling, the committee acted very promptly and the matter is here now for your consideration.

In order that I may set the situation out in the fewest possible words may I read a few words from a telegram received by Representative CHRISTOPHERSON from Mr. Ralph W. Tackaberry, general secretary, chamber of commerce, Sioux City, Iowa:

Spent Wednesday with Evans at Mitchell.

Evans is the efficient representative of the Red Cross in that area.

Feed needs in drought area of Iowa, South Dakota, Nebraska next 90 days tremendous. Voluntary contributors can not carry the load much longer. Ten to fifteen thousand farmers needing feed for foundation stock, from 50 to 100 bushels. This disregards farmers with large herds.

The bill before us is, therefore, a double proposition; it provides food for human beings in any part of the country where necessity develops and, in addition thereto, provides feed for so-called foundation livestock in the crop-failure areas of 1931. The able Representatives from South Dakota, accompanied by their junior Senator and supported by other Members of Congress in that area, presented a graphic picture of the distress. A combination of crop failure in 1931, accompanied by destructive grasshopper invasion, practically ruined crops of all kinds. On top of this an exceptionally hard winter is just coming to a close. The combination has taxed the resources of this whole section as well as making substantial levies upon near-by communities to supply both food and feed.

A careful survey indicated immediate need for 3,500 cars of corn, 900 cars of small grains, and 12,500 cars of hay. No provision is made in this measure for the purchase of hay, but wheat could be substituted for corn, which would make the requirements in South Dakota alone 4,400 carloads.

John Barton Payne, chairman of the American National Red Cross, appeared before the committee and emphasized the special needs of this area and stated that the Red Cross would be glad to assume the responsibility of administering whatever relief might be provided. When questioned as to whether or not he would prefer to have the cash rather than the actual wheat he replied, "The Red Cross would not accept a cash donation." He further stated that the Red Cross "would accept any commodity which Congress thought should be given out for relief purposes, because the commodity passes and that is at an end, and that establishes, as I see it, no dangerous precedent." This distinction evidently indicates Mr. Payne's differentiation between the relief provided in this bill and what is commonly known as a dole. Various phases of the bill will be presented in discussions by other members of the committee. In my opinion immediate action is required if the situation in South Dakota is to be met. Every community has done its best to meet the entire situation without outside help, but their resources are insufficient. I, therefore, earnestly hope that a practically unanimous vote may be given the bill, without material change, in order that the wheat may begin to move into this particular section at the earlist possible moment.

Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. WILLIAMSON].

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] has so well expressed the situation that exists generally throughout the country that there is not very much need of further elaboration at the present time.

I think this is the first time in the history of the Northwest, at any rate within my recollection, that we have felt obliged to come to the Congress and ask relief of the character provided for in the pending resolution.

Last year in South Dakota was a season of subnormal rainfall. We had only about 30 to 43 per cent of normal rainfall during the growing season in my district. Upon the east side of the river we had a rainfall of between 43 and 70 per cent of normal. You people know that this amount of moisture can not produce a crop where the normal rainfall is from 17 to 25 inches per annum.

On top of all this we had the worst scourge of grasshoppers that any State in the Union has ever experienced. The devastation over 10 or 12 counties was so complete in many places that there was not feed enough left on some farms to feed a cow or a horse or a sheep. Other counties suffered severely but had some feed. Many farms were left as barren of vegetation as the floor of this Chamber. No one who did not see the area could have any conception of what that country looked like. There were many farms in that territory where there was not a tree left with a leaf upon it. In some places shrubs and trees were just as barren as they are in midwinter. No forage of any kind was produced and no grain of any description went into the bins. Many of the farmers in the grasshopper-infected area moved their stock out of the country as early as September into territory where there was some feed.

To make matters still worse, we had an early snowfall in November, followed by a thaw which left the ground caked with ice. Further snows came in the following weeks and they have remained on the ground during the entire winter. As a result livestock could not feed upon the prairies, thereby rapidly depleting the meager supply the farmers had. About all the feed the farmers did have was what was left over from 1930, or such straw or Russian thistles as they were able to get. Many farmers cut the Russian thistle along the roadside, along the edge of the fields, and everywhere a particle of forage could be found, in the hope of pulling their livestock through the winter. If we had had a normal open winter, our stock would have come through without danger of a great deal of loss, but for more than three months now we have had to feed. Feed has become completely exhausted in many areas. The Red Cross has shipped in large amounts of hay and grain, local people have subscribed considerable amounts of money and have purchased feed and sent it out to the farmers, and many carloads donated by the people of surrounding States have been shipped in; but with all this aid it has become perfectly apparent that unless some further aid can be secured we are going to lose thousands of head of stock in South Dakota, eastern Wyoming and Montana, and in certain parts of Minnesota, and even in several counties of Iowa.

I am glad that the Committee on Agriculture amended this bill so as to make the wheat available for human food. This should have been done a long time ago. However, under this measure help should come in time to save the livestock in this territory, if the bill goes through conference shortly and the wheat can be immediately sent into the area where the need is the most pressing.

We have assurances from the Red Cross that they have the organization ready and can move this grain into the affected area within a few hours after the passage and approval of this bill.

I have every confidence that this will result in saving a very large number of cattle throughout the entire Northwest and will be of inestimable value to the needy people throughout the country.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FULMER].

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, I am going to support this resolution solely on the ground that grinding and distributing 40,000,000 bushels of wheat will tend to relieve the serious suffering that we have to-day among the unemployed and distressed people of the country.

Judge Payne and others coming before the Committee on Agriculture on this resolution stated that especially in the cities they had just as much distress and need of garments and clothing as food to be distributed to these people.

For your information, I may state I have pending before the Committee on Agriculture a bill proposing to use not to exceed one-half million bales of cotton on the same basis and under the same organization that will handle this wheat proposition. Judge Payne stated, and so did the members of the Farm Board, that cotton could be handled just as easily and as quickly as the wheat.

In voting for this resolution, I want to state to you, my friends, we are not doing anything that will really help the farmer, because we are only taking out of the wheat we now have stored 40,000,000 bushels, without giving any authority to the board to go into the open market and buy back this 40,000,000 bushels of wheat, which in that instance would help the price of the wheat now in the hands of the farmer.

This Congress has been appropriating millions to help railroads, bankers, and corporations, but up to this time, my friends, this Congress has passed very little legislation that will really help farmers or cure the serious economic condition that now exists.

I want to say that until the Congress does something to put the millions of unemployed to work at a fair wage rate, and gives farmers a fair price for that which they are producing, you are going to continue to have to vote millions for the Finance Corporation, and millions of bushels of wheat for the distressed people of this country. [Applause.]

These people who are in such a distressed condition to-day are not in that condition because of anything they have failed to do. These people are anxious to go to work, they are begging for work; there are millions of farmers anxious to pay their taxes and pay their obligations, and it is no fault of theirs that they are not doing it, because they are unable to sell their products at a price which will enable them to meet their obligations.

Someone may ask, how are you going to do this? It is a strange thing to me as a layman, that this Congress is able to pass legislation whereby you relieve the railroads and the public utilities so that they may receive a fair profit. Certainly, there ought to be some scheme where we could legislate to bring about a fair price for agricultural interests.

I am hoping that the bill will pass, because, as I stated a few minutes ago, it will tend to relieve this distressed situation that we have at this time. It is my belief that until we do something for the agricultural interests which will tend to help every interest you will have to continue to do this, and perhaps pass other unsound, temporary relief measures. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GLOVER].

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, we have before us at this time a bill of very great importance, which turns over to the Red Cross wheat now in storage, for the relief of people in want and hunger. It is estimated that we have more than 8,000,000 people now in the United States out of employment, and, of course, that means that many of them are in destitute circumstances and want.

We have recently had hearings before the Agricultural Committee, of which I am a member, on the bill now up for consideration, that aroused the sympathy of every man who was a member of that committee. In the Dakotas and the adjacent States that are now suffering so badly the picture brought before us was one of absolute pity, which deserves immediate relief.

We had there before us the pictures of many cattle, horses, and other animals starving to death. I thought a little more than a year ago, in the State of Arkansas, where I have the privilege of living, that we had as deplorable a situation as could possibly exist, but when we see the conditions of these States where snow is piled up all over the entire surface of the earth to such an extent that there is no way of travel and absolutely nothing for stock to feed on it presents a more deplorable condition than my own State has recently gone through with.

Fortunately for Arkansas, we had a warm winter that saved the lives of much of our stock, but in this other region they must be fed as well as the people or almost all of the stock will starve.

The people of the adjacent States to this territory have come to their rescue as best they could, but yet the picture is dark. The Representatives from those States appeared before us pleading for the relief from the distressed condition there, as described to you.

The United States Government now has multiplied millions of bushels of wheat piled up in the bins of the United States, and the cost of carrying it is a heavy charge; and, besides that, if kept in the storage too long it will soon be a total loss to the Government. It would seem a pitiable shame to allow this wheat to remain in the bins while people and stock suffer in the midst of it.

Some have charged that aid of this character would be equal to a dole. I do not agree with that thought at all. I am as much opposed to a dole as any man in this Congress, and I do not want to see the United States Government ever go into that system. But there is a difference between feeding a hungry man and a dole. There is no person that has a spark of feeling for humanity that would dare say that the Government, with all of this wheat in its hands and food that could be delivered to persons in distress, should stand by and let them suffer and hoards away this wheat.

The truth of the whole matter is that if the hungry were properly fed and those needing clothes were properly clothed there would be no great surplus of wheat, corn, cotton, rice, or any other of our great staple crops but they would be consumed and the price for them would be far greater than it is now. [Applause.]

We had before us this week that great humanitarian, John Barton Payne, who stated that his organization, the Red Cross, would administer this wheat to the use of those in distress. It goes without saying when it is administered through the Red Cross that it reaches only those that are in absolute need, because of the large experience that this organization has had in relieving humanity. [Applause.]

The railroads have been very kind indeed as stated by Mr. Payne, in that in practically all of the distress they have carried the feed and food free of charge where it was administered by the Red Cross, and he had every reason to believe that they would do so in this case.

The by-products produced from the milling of wheat into flour will pay every expense connected with it. Besides that the great millers of the country have been very generous and kind to the suffering humanity and have contributed to them by processing wheat into flour free of charge.

The only argument that seems to be offered against the using of the wheat now in hand by the Government, is that other wheat-growing countries think that the Government should go out and buy again, on the market, and thus stimulate the trade in wheat.

This seems to be not well founded because the Government has the wheat on hand and it would be nonsensical to buy more wheat when they have plenty already paid for that can be used for this purpose.

If we can help the distressed people out of this dilemma with the same efficiency as the drought relief was handled in the Southland recently, we know it will be only a short time until this distress of these people is removed.

I remember very well when we began the agitation for relief for drought sufferers before in Congress, that it was quite a while before Congress realized as a whole the distress that was then prevailing. A hungry man is a dangerous piece of machinery, and no American citizen that lives and serves under the Stars and Stripes should ever be allowed to suffer from hunger by conditions over which he could have no possible control.

Possibly when the distress of these people is removed by this bill as it will be, they will follow the course of many of those in our Southland. You will remember there was a slight demonstration for food at one point in Arkansas that happened to be in my district. The Red Cross immediately went to that locality and very materially assisted in relieving their distress. A very beautiful illustration of their appreciation was made this year when they had a bountiful crop and coal miners were suffering for food at Henryetta, Okla., these same people loaded up their trucks, 15 in number, with food and carried it over there and delivered it to them, and helped relieve their distress. This is the Spirit of the Master and the spirit of humanity.

The question is frequently asked, when matters of this kind come up, why it is the States do not issue bonds and come to the rescue of their own people. That question was answered by the Senator and Members of Congress who appeared before our committee. They state that the constitution of their States prohibit the issuance of bonds which is indeed a very wise provision for any State, because the most of those who have had the privilege of issuing bonds have issued so many bonds that their State is burdened to death by paying interest on bonded indebtedness instead of having money to run their State and county governments and to maintain schools as they should.

Besides this, it would be very difficult at this time of depression to sell paper of that character even if it could be issued.

If this Congress had in the beginning of this session pursued a different policy, in my opinion, much of the distress that now prevails in our United States could have been relieved before this time. [Applause.]

The first bill that has passed this House that tended to carry relief to the unemployed was only passed a few days ago, and now we find the heads of some of the administrations fighting that measure. This brings about a pitiable situation. Everything that could be done by every department should be done to bring about a different condition so that people wanting to work could have employment.

If the Senate passes the bill, it will give employment to nearly a million working men and will relieve about one-eighth of the distress on account of the unemployment. If we could find seven other measures of like kind to give them employment, it would do far more good than the passing of such legislation as has been passed by this Congress and recommended by this administration.

The Ways and Means Committee is soon to report out a measure as is indicated by the press reports, seeking to raise between one and two billion dollars within the next year to balance the deficit in the Treasury.

To my mind, at this time of distress, when no one is making any money except the few that enjoy special privileges, it is nonsense to tax the people to try to raise enough money to balance this within two years. What we should do is use what funds are available and pass this deficiency on to the general debt of the Government without trying to go out and raise it by taxes against the people in this time of distress.

If you attempt to further increase taxes, you will continue to drive capital out of business and into hiding, and the Lord knows we have enough of that now.

My idea of balancing this Treasury deficit is to pass such legislation as is indicated in a bill that I introduced here last week taxing American capital invested in foreign countries. This would from the very beginning bring $50,000,000 or more in revenue taxes each year. That is the character of legislation that appeals to me rather than a direct tax on the individual who is now already taxed until he can not bear the burden. It has been well and truly said "the power to tax is the power to destroy." It seems that we have reached the point in taxation in our State and National Government where we have totally destroyed the business in this country.

When business is prosperous then a revenue tax is collected from income, but when business is stagnated, as it is now, then there is no source of revenue available except through a tariff tax which has been the burden that has held the American people down for these many years.

The trouble with America to-day is that the wealth of the Nation is cornered into the hands of a few individuals.

We know very well when we pass this bill and turn over this relief work to Mr. John Barton Payne that the job will be done well and that everyone suffering will be relieved so far as this relief will go, and it should relieve every needy person in the United States. It is general in its effect and applies to any place in the United States where there is suffering.

I hope and trust this bill will pass the House by a large majority, and I see no reason why it should not. [Applause.]

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CLARKE].

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, I know of no better example of Christian helpfulness in the United States than the acts first of Uncle Sam and the Red Cross in their contribution to the distressed people in Representative GLOVER'S district in Arkansas just about a year ago, and I know of no better answer of gratefulness that could be made than the record of that same people in Arkansas, who, having been helped, in turn sent hundreds of loads of food into Oklahoma to help another distressed portion of our United States. [Applause.] That was an outstanding act of "casting bread upon the water" and its being returned all buttered.

Mr. GLOVER. And the very people that participated in the hunger strike in Arkansas carried the food over there—15 cars at one time.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. What are the facts regarding this resolution? There was no politics, unless it was introduced into this proposition on its original consideration, and if politics was then introduced, it came from two men with indistinguishable, phantom ideas regarding the needs of the people, who were playing politics with it, and one was a Republican and the other a Democrat. When we asked them in the Agriculture Committee what they knew about it, they confessed that they did not know much except glittering generalities.

We in the Agricultural Committee have not had any real, exact facts before us until last Tuesday regarding the actual needs of the drought-stricken grasshopper-infested section of this country of ours, and it came before us when those outstanding sons of South Dakota—ROYAL JOHNSON, Representatives WILLIAMSON and CHRISTOPHERSON, and one Senator from there—came over to our committee with the story of the effect of the drought and the grasshopper plague. Starvation going on among the people and their cattle stuck in the snow, dying by thousands, and so forth. When that picture was squarely placed before our committee we instantly dissolved politics and said that the Agricultural Committee stands for helpfulness, and that is where we stand to-day in this resolution.

Mr. KETCHAM. And is it not true that in the other hearings whatever admissions we secured from those who appeared we had to drag out of them?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Quite right. My only objection to the people of South Dakota coming down here the way they did is exactly the same objection I have had to other Representatives pleading before our committee time after time, claiming that their constitution prevents them from helping themselves. For God's sake, go home and change your constitution so that you can do something for your own people instead of coming here asking Uncle Sam to help you. We also have another class of people coming around here hollering for help, appearing before our Agricultural Committee, saying that their legislature is a biennial or quadrennial aggregation, and that they can not do anything because they only meet every two or four years, and could not at this time help their own people. There ought to be some method of serving notice upon these legislatures and these people that we are willing to go along in this great national and international emergency, but that they should have faith to get their own State constitutions ready for such emergencies and their State laws in shape so that they can help themselves. They will get no help from Uncle Sam.

Self-help breeds self-respect. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLANNAGAN].

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I am glad, at last, that the Members of this body have an opportunity to vote on this bill. I advocated before Congress convened the principles embodied in this bill. Since Congress has been in session I have done all I could to bring the bill out of the committee.

When we first held hearings on the bill back around the 1st of January, I voted for the bill to be reported out. The necessity existed then, in my opinion, as much as it exists to-day. A majority of the committee voted against me. Since then, I presume, they have heard from home, because they all seem to be riding on the band wagon to-day.

Is there a necessity? Let us see.

I will only review the testimony of Judge Payne. He stated that the Red Cross was feeding men, women, and children in 1,850 counties, which is about one-half of the counties in the United States, and that these counties were scattered over every State in the Union.

The need, of course, is more acute in some States than others. For instance, he states that the Red Cross is feeding 42,219 in Montana, 47,440 in North Dakota, 14,399 in South Dakota, and 6,603 in Nebraska, and that it has shipped 400 carloads of feed for cattle into South Dakota and 1,000 carloads into Nebraska.

These are just the high spots in his testimony, and they clearly show that a real necessity exists.

The testimony before the committee, to my mind, clearly shows that many of the States and local communities are unable to cope with the present situation, and that in many places if relief is given it will have to come from the Federal Government.

Knowing that the necessity exists, is it not our duty to come to the relief? Shall we be more considerate of the needs of others than we are of our own people? Why, in time of need we went to the relief of Russia, Germany, and other nations, not with wheat, but with American dollars. Every time the cry has come from Macedonia we have responded. Now the cry comes from America—comes from our own people—and I, for one, intend to heed that cry and vote for this bill.

They are not asking for American dollars, but for some of the wheat owned by the Government. The Farm Board owns 157,000,000 bushels of wheat which cost us 81 cents per bushel, and which, in a few years, if not disposed of, will greatly deteriorate or be eaten up in interest and carrying charges. It costs 18 cents per bushel per year to carry a bushel of wheat.

Why, if we can trade this wheat off to Argentina for 9 cents per bushel, can not we afford to give a little to the hungry? The Farm Board exchanged 25,000,000 bushels of wheat to Argentina for 138,000,000 pounds of coffee, and we will average, I understand, at best, about 9 cents per bushel for the wheat.

Oh, the scarecrow in this bill seems to be the fear of some that it will be considered a dole. Their statesmanship will not permit them to vote for anything that smacks of a dole.

Well, I do not care what you call it; I am not interested in names, I am interested in feeding the hungry. [Applause.]

Why, a piece of bread, made from this wheat, will taste as good to a hungry man whether it is doled out to him or whether he purchases it at the Mayflower and has it served on a silver platter by a liveried waiter, and it will do him just as much good.

We appropriate money to protect our citizens from all known diseases, except the worst of all diseases, undernourishment. We appropriate money to protect the homes and firesides of our people. And yet some seem to think that it is all wrong to appropriate wheat to feed the hungry in our land because someone will probably say it is a dole.

It is a sad spectacle to see men who have never felt the pangs of hunger, who do not know what it means to go without three good meals a day, who are living on the fat of the land, who have never experienced the despair unemployment brings, who are unacquainted with the misery and distress suffered by those who, through no fault of their own, are unable to provide for those God has committed to their keeping, and who must realize the immediate necessity for action, in the name of statesmanship, stand here and quibble over a name—over whether this is a dole or a relief measure—and let that be the criterion by which they will decide whether or not the hungry shall be fed. [Applause.]

Statesmanship! What a crime will be committed in Thy exalted name if this bill is killed because statesmen can not vote for it; if, perchance, they should decide after interminable debate that it is a dole and not a relief measure.

Statesmanship! Why if that is statesmanship all I have to say is—and I am a Presbyterian elder and believe my church will voice my sentiment—damn such statesmanship. [Applause.]

I am not looking to statesmanship to direct me in my vote on this bill. Rather I am looking to my conscience, which has been quickened by the teachings of the One who fed the hungry, for guidance and direction. And I want to bear witness that I have never gone wrong when I followed the inner voice. [Applause.]

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. HALL].

Mr. HALL of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, as a general principle I would be opposed to this sort of legislation, but in a time of necessity, such as we have faced in North Dakota and in the United States generally during the last two years, I am heartily in favor of it, and I want to say that I believe the people over the grain-raising section of our country are to be greatly benefited by it. I do not believe it will have a depressing effect on the market price of the coming crops. I believe we might as well get it out of the visible supply, out of the show window, at this time, so that we may be able to have some chance of a little better market price for next year's crop.

The people of North Dakota are doing everything possible to help themselves. I know they are doing it in South Dakota. They have greatly benefited through the work of the Red Cross. Our State organizations, all the civic clubs, all the churches are working hand in hand, and we are getting along fairly well, except that we must have something to help out in the feeding of our livestock, the family cow and the chickens, which mean so much to the people living out on the broad prairies and on farms generally in the crop-failure areas. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SANDLIN].

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to take up much time of this committee. I think what is necessary is the expeditious passage of this measure. I think the Congress has waited too long already. The best thing to do is to pass the bill quickly. Everybody admits that conditions are such in this country that legislation of this kind should be passed. This legislation is unusual. Conditions and times are unusual. We have already passed legislation which is unusual, and before this session adjourns, in my humble opinion, we will pass other legislation which is unusual and which usually does not have the consideration of Congress.

I have been interested in this measure since its introduction. I had the pleasure of appearing before the committee urging that the bill be reported. I hope it will be enacted into law and that much good will come from it. [Applause.]

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE].

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I deplore the fact that there has been any question of politics injected into the discussion of this question. I am sorry also that the hearings before the committee have not been printed, because I am satisfied that if the Members of this House would read the hearings which were held several weeks ago they would have agreed with at least a majority of the committee at that time that no case had been made out for the donation of this wheat. Since that time the committee has had further hearings, and the three Members of this House from South Dakota and other Members of Congress were there, and in the judgment of a majority of the committee they made a strong showing that some of this wheat was needed for livestock feed in the Northwestern States.

I think that is all there is to the question as to why this bill was not reported out earlier than it was. There was an honest difference of opinion between the members of the committee as to whether or not a case had been made out.

There is one thing that has not been discussed as yet, and that is the important matter of what effect this measure is going to have on the wheat farmer. Representing, as I do, a district which last year produced 14 per cent of all the wheat grown in the United States, I feel that that is a subject which should be given some serious consideration.

I do not believe there is any doubt at all but that if there is a free distribution of 40,000,000 bushels of wheat it is going to have an adverse effect on the wheat market and that those farmers who still have wheat in their bins, holding it for a higher price, are going to suffer. In my district alone I am informed there are to-day something like 35,000,000 bushels of wheat in the hands of farmers. I do not think there is any doubt but that if some of this wheat could go into new channels of distribution it would not affect the farmers adversely, and probably most of the wheat that goes into the Northwest for the feeding of livestock will be wheat that would not be consumed otherwise. This amount, however, will be comparatively small. But as far as the wheat which is going to be used for feeding people in the cities is concerned, I think we will all have to admit that there will be no more of it consumed than would have been consumed if it had been bought in the open market through these relief organizations. The statistics of the milling industry show that we have been milling just as much wheat during these past few months, approximately, as we did in 1930 or in 1929 or in any normal year. So apparently consumption has been just about the same as it usually is. Therefore I do not think we are justified in saying that the passage of this bill is going to increase the consumption of wheat for food in any way, and if it does not it means we are going to have some of the wheat which ordinarily would be purchased from the farmers of this country given away, thus depriving the farmers of that much of a market.

I wish it were possible to offer an amendment to this bill to provide that this wheat should be bought in the open market from the farmers of this country, so that they would not be called upon to suffer when this distribution is made. Under the form of this bill such an amendment would not be germane, but I sincerely wish the bill was subject to such an amendment, because I do not believe the added burden of this distribution should be borne by the wheat farmers of this country, particularly in view of the fact that every bushel of wheat they produced this year was sold far below the cost of production.

Here is one other matter which I think ought to have some consideration, and that is for every bushel of wheat the Farm Board releases it is going to have to pay 32 cents a bushel. That is the amount of the loans held by the intermediate credit bank and must be paid before the wheat can be given away. That means that the funds which the Farm Board has available for loans to cooperative organizations are going to be curtailed that much, because the board is going to have to pay 32 cents a bushel for every bushel that is released. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KLEBERG].

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, speaking for the farmers and as one of them, I would advise the membership of the House that the farmers have no desire to profit at the expense of those who are hungry. The farmers have no desire to prolong their hunger. Congress now knows the facts in so far as the condition of this country is concerned. I do not intend to utilize much time, because I do not believe we should prolong the time in which it will be possible to satisfy the pangs of hunger of the suffering people of this country. I see no reason on earth why there should be any continued debate on this very meritorious bill. This is an act of constructive charity under both the inherent and constitutional powers of this Government. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. POLK].

Mr. POLK. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it is indeed gratifying to see how our friends on the other side of the aisle are scrambling now to get on the band wagon and be for this bill providing for the distribution of Government-owned wheat for the needy.

Just 21 days ago, on February 12, I called the attention of the House to the reasons why the House Agricultural Committee had not reported out Senate Joint Resolution 60, providing for the distribution of Government-owned wheat for the needy. My remarks on that subject are recorded on page 3821 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

I have been much amused by the claim made here to-day by some of those gentlemen who had formerly opposed this legislation that they were not aware that there is any actual need for such relief. Be that as it may, I am glad to know that they are now ready to support this proposed legislation.

It certainly speaks well for the leadership of this House that a special rule has been brought in providing for the prompt consideration of this meritorious legislation at this time.

As a farmer, and one vitally interested in the practical effect of this bill on the farmers of America, I disagree with the distinguished gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE] in his statement that this bill will be injurious to the wheat farmers of America. On the other hand, I think it will tend to benefit them. We all know that one of the causes of the extremely low wheat prices during this past year has been this immense amount of wheat hoarded by the Farm Board, which has been hanging over the heads of the American farmers, without the buyers knowing when it might be put on the market, and thus it has depressed the price of wheat far below what that price might have been had not this vast supply of wheat been in existence. The wheat farmers of America will be benefited when all of the 160,000,000 bushels of wheat hoarded by the Grain Stabilization Corporation is disposed of. They will be benefited to the extent that this 40,000,000 bushels of wheat, which this bill proposes to distribute to the needy people of America, will decrease the total amount held by the Stabilization Corporation. And that brings me to a thought I wish to throw in with reference to section 3 of this bill, which provides for reimbursing the Grain Stabilization Corporation with an amount equal to the current market value of the wheat which is given to the needy. In my humble opinion, it is a mistake to even reimburse the Grain Stabilization Corporation for this Government-owned wheat. I think it is merely sending good money after bad. It was brought out over in the Senate, when this subject was under discussion, that the Grain Stabilization Corporation has sold 25,000,000 bushels of wheat to China, and in payment for this wheat they have taken Chinese bonds and other Chinese securities, which are considered by many to be absolutely worthless. Furthermore it has been shown that when the Grain Stabilization Corporation traded American wheat for Brazilian coffee that the amount received by the Grain Stabilization Corporation for such wheat so traded was only 9 cents per bushel. Therefore when we specify in this bill that the Grain Stabilization Corporation shall be credited with an amount equal to the current market value of wheat, we are allowing them far more for this wheat for the needy than they have ever gotten for a single bushel of wheat that they have sold to foreign governments. I am sorry that the committee did not see fit to strike out that part of section 3 which provides for the reimbursement of the Grain Stabilization Corporation. Nevertheless, because of the great need for the prompt enactment of this bill, I intend to vote for it even though it will entail some unnecessary burdens on the Treasury, which would have been eliminated by cutting out this reimbursement clause.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADKINS].

Mr. ADKINS. Mr. Chairman, I do not think there needs to be any particular fuss made about who is responsible for the delay in this matter, whether it is a Democrat or a Republican. I am one of the fellows who is responsible for whatever delay I could bring about in passing such legislation as this, and I am not apologizing for it.

Ever since I have been in Congress there has been before our committee a proposition to help out some unfortunate State in the matter of buying seed, feed, or something of that sort. In my first session of Congress I went back and looked up a veto message of Grover Cleveland when they had come in here and asked that the Government extend aid by buying seed, feed, and so forth for the drought-stricken area in Texas, where a whole neighborhood had been devastated, and the reasons he gave were pretty good, even though he was a Democrat. [Laughter and applause.] He set out the fact that if we ever started such a program we would never get rid of it, and that is the situation now.

This is a big country, and during every session of Congress we have some unfortunate situation arise in the country, and they come here; and since you got the precedent started they have continued to do so and will always do so so long as the Federal Government will give such aid.

Now, what is the situation? There is not a neighborhood in the whole Nation but what has people in distress just at this time. There is not a neighborhood in the whole Nation but what faces the obligation to see that its citizens do not suffer. Our State recognized this fact and went out and did what? My own community and every other community—and I live in a city of 60,000 people—went out and made local arrangements to take care of their unfortunate people. Then our legislature, in special session, arranged it so that we could make a special tax levy by townships, which we are paying now. Then our legislature, in special session, provided that the counties might make a bond issue to take care of such situations as these, and then, just recently, we passed a $20,000,000 bond issue that the State could use to relieve such a situation, if necessary.

Now, do not think that we have not other bond issues in my State. We issued over $50,000,000 of bonds to give to our soldiers as bonuses. We issued $160,000,000 for roads, and we issued $20,000,000 for waterways. We have these large obligations, and we have the people's property being sold for taxes, but yet we are going to take care of our citizens.

One would suppose to hear some people talk that everybody is starving. I had some experience as an overseer of the poor in my younger days. Who is it that suffers in times like these? The only person in any city that is worthy of the name of a city or in any community that is worthy of the name is the proud person who is out of work and will not ask for alms until some neighbor finds it out and reports it. The other fellow gets all he wants. He comes and gets assistance every week, and we are not going to let anybody suffer if we can help it in our State where their necessities are known.

In all the years I have been in Congress I have always asked every single representative appearing on behalf of any State, Has the State done what it ought to do? And the reply is, "Well, our constitution does not permit us to issue bonds to do this." They never will as long as the Federal Government gives them such relief.

Why, our State does. We provide for such emergencies. We do not come down here with a tincup asking the Federal Government to hand out something.

I remember a few years ago when the Federal authorities said in Madison County, Ill., that they would not let anybody ship any wheat out of there unless certain things were done because it would menace the whole country. Did we come here and ask Congress to take care of the matter? No; we came along with an emergency fund and bought nearly all the formaldehyde that they had in St. Louis and disinfected the farmers' wheat so they could ship it out. We did this not for their own benefit but for the benefit of the whole country.

They talk about this wheat, but it does not make any difference about the wheat. You are not going to help the wheat farmer by doing this. It is all in the show window anyhow, and they say the storage charges are eating it up. For 50 years we have carried as much wheat as we are doing now if the crop was as large, and we have always carried some over until July and had some left, and usually the man that carried it had carrying charges. I do not know how the Farm Board is running its business, but if it is running it the way some of you say the board is, it had better be closed out, because they are poor grain merchants. [Applause.]

Charitable agencies now purchase this bread through the regular markets for these people. Under this bill they will take it from the Farm Board supply and be out of the market for at least 40,000,000 bushels of wheat, certainly not helping the wheat market. Illinois can carry their extra tax burden to take care of their people, then help other States that do not bond themselves for such purposes.

Every State should look after its people. When their last resource is exhausted, then the Federal Government, of course, should step in.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW].

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, in our efforts to help humanity we Members of Congress are constantly doing all sorts of visionary and impractical things. That is because of the weakness of human judgment and the limitation of finite vision. We grope in the labyrinths of uncertainty for something of tangible benefit to mankind. We see through a glass darkly and often we are deceived by what at first appear to be strong and dependable timbers for a structure of real humanitarian service, but which on a test prove to be pillars of sand. And then, again, when we are most discouraged by failures we come across a proposal that holds true, a proposal that does not fail when it is put to the test, a proposal that furnishes a foundation for real helpfulness as solid as the Rock of Ages.

Such a proposal is the one now before the House. In this country 8,000,000 men are out of work and the sustaining incomes of 25,000,000 people have been cut off. Millions are hungry and millions more are undernourished. In transferring 40,000,000 bushels of wheat from the storage bins to feed the hungry poor, the Congress of the United States is acting with clear vision and sound purpose as becomes a great nation that wants to take care of its own. It is no fault of these men and women and children that they are hungry. God knows they would infinitely prefer work to charity. They tramp the streets looking for employment until life seems too bitter to endure, but do not find it. We spent millions to relieve the hungry of Belgium and Russia and other countries around the world, and that is all right. God bless the Belgian children and the Russian children. I love them, but I do not believe we should hold them any closer in our affectionate embraces than we hold the little Indiana children who say their prayers and go to bed hungry.

I can see the happiness that will radiate from many faces in Indiana when this relief comes. I can visualize some of the joy it will bring to the populous centers, and then my mind travels to the coal-mining section of the State where all winter 5,000 little children have been living on the thin crust of charity, and I think what a blessing it will be to them when the Army trucks roll up and fill the bare cupboards of their homes with the flour into which this wheat is to be processed at one of our large mills in Indianapolis. When we give to these children the means of sustaining life we are not only doing a good work and a kind work but we are making a capital investment for our country, because nothing will ever erase from the minds of these boys the thought that a government that is good enough to feed them when they are starving is good enough to fight for and to die for. [Applause.]

On December 8 last, at the opening of Congress, I introduced one of the first of the so-called wheat bills, known as House Joint Resolution No. 106, and I have watched with solicitude the ups and downs of this and similar measures in the House Committee on Agriculture. I was the first witness to be heard by the committee in favor of this relief, and I can not tell how glad I am that the committee finally decided to report out legislation and that the legislation it has reported will to-day pass this House of Representatives.

I believe the initiative in the direction of this legislation was taken by the Salvation Army of Indiana. At any rate, the first knowledge I had of it was when Maj. James Murphy, division commander of the Salvation Army for the State of Indiana, sought my aid last year to secure three carloads of wheat from the surplus, to be processed into flour at one of the large Indianapolis mills, which agreed to donate its services, and from there to be distributed by United States Army trucks from Fort Benjamin Harrison to the Salvation Army distributing stations in Indiana. I took the matter up then with Chairman Stone of the Federal Farm Board, who referred it to Mr. G. S. Milnor, president of the Grain Stabilization Corporation. Both Chairman Stone and Mr. Milnor were entirely sympathetic with the proposal, but were forced to reject the application for the reason that the agricultural marketing act was not a relief measure and there was no authority in law to grant the request. However, both were agreeable at that time to the proposal of an amendment to the law which would authorize the distribution of wheat for the purpose indicated.

Mr. Milnor wrote to me on September 30 last as follows:

> The steps that you and your associates are taking in connection with the Salvation Army to relieve distress in your territory are most commendable and seem to me to be along thoroughly practicable lines. Permit me to express the hope that other communities may take inspiration from such a program as you indicate and immediately undertake measures of a similar nature.

Aside from the humanitarian benefits that will flow from the distribution of this wheat, the Government is making a good bargain in getting rid of it. In storage charges, interest, and insurance it is costing the Government 18 cents a bushel, or $7,200,000 per annum, to carry these 40,000,000 bushels. Donating the wheat to the poor will rid the Government of this annual charge, which happens to be exactly the amount the Government paid for the Territory of Alaska. The farmers of America will benefit, because this gigantic wheat surplus hangs over them like a sword of Damocles, to the utter demoralization of their wheat market.

Prof. Robert E. Brown, of Oberlin, has demonstrated that palatable meals, mostly of wheat foods, can be served for 3 cents or less a portion. Think how many blessings for hungry children are wrapped up in this donation of 40,000,000 bushels of wheat!

In Indiana a perfect set-up has been arranged by which this wheat will be processed into flour at a large Indianapolis mill free of charge and will be distributed by Army trucks from Fort Benjamin Harrison to the 42 points of Salvation Army contact in the State. Thus the relief will be made 100 per cent effective.

In closing my remarks I can not forego paying a humble tribute to the Salvation Army which I long ago learned to admire through close observation of its activities in Indiana and other States. It is difficult for me to refrain from the use of superlatives when I speak of the Salvation Army and its work. In the common parlance of the day, I am completely "sold on the Salvation Army." Speaking as one who has seen a great deal of the world, its flotsam and jetsam, as well as its pleasures and its palaces, the social agency which I believe accomplishes the most good is the one that reaches out into all of the walks of life and touches the poorest of the poor. That agency is the Salvation Army. In a thousand practical ways it meets the everyday needs of humanity and lifts it up and strengthens it. I know of no other agency on earth which it seems to me so completely exemplifies the spirit of the Master and demonstrates what He meant when He said nearly 2,000 years ago:

For I was an hungered, and ye gave me meat; I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink; I was a stranger, and ye took me in.

Naked, and ye clothed me; I was sick, and ye visited me; I was in prison, and ye came unto me.

Verily, I say unto you, inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto me.

[Applause.]

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. CAMPBELL].

Mr. CAMPBELL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I first wish to say that I propose to address the most of my remarks to conditions up in the Northwest, but I want every Member here to know that I put the lives of the individual citizens of my country—the children, the women, and the men—above that of the livestock.

I want to say that this matter had been called to my attention at the beginning of Congress, and at that time I offered in every way—even to signing a petition to bring it out of the committee and support the 40,000,000-bushel wheat bill.

The other day when I went before the Agricultural Committee on the 5,000,000-bushel bill I felt at that time—and I told the members of the committee—that it was not enough. It certainly was a great satisfaction to me to learn 15 or 20 minutes afterwards that that committee had voted to report a bill for 40,000,000 bushels.

I suppose of the 40,000,000 bushels probably five or six million bushels will be used for feeding the cattle and the livestock. To support some of the evidence that was produced before the committee and the speeches that have been made here by the gentleman from South Dakota and the gentleman from Nebraska, I wish to say that the part of this devastated territory laps over into my district, although we expect to get very little help from the bill. In our country the towns have been giving thousands of dollars and shipping carloads of feed into the territory that is so distressed, and I have letter after letter in which they state that they have gone as far as they can.

My friends, I wish I had an opportunity to show you these pictures that were referred to by the gentleman from Arkansas in relation to the conditions that exist up in Dakota, Nebraska, and a small part of Iowa. They show here dead cattle as they are strewed about in the fields and the conditions of the work horses that will be put out to do the work in the spring.

I know that last year we supported these measures for the distressed districts in the South, and we are just as bad off, if not worse, out there in our territory to-day than they were at that time.

Mr. HARE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Iowa. I yield.

Mr. HARE. The gentleman has told us about the hungry and the starving. Are they also naked?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Iowa. No. I will say, as far as I know, they are not naked.

Mr. HARE. Does not the gentleman think that we might supply them with cotton to help keep them warm?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Iowa. I am willing to do that; I am willing to do all I can to supply them with cotton.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, the bill before the House proposes to deliver to the Red Cross 40,000,000 bushels of wheat now held in storage by the Government in an effort to stabilize grain prices, the grain to be used in any form desired for feeding many thousands of people now cared for by the Red Cross. The only condition or restriction is that no cost of manufacture into flour or other forms of food shall be a charge against the Government.

Brief reference to the condition which confronts Congress is proper in any discussion of the subject because it discloses that a recognized responsibility for helping to relieve suffering hungry people is coupled with a disposal of storage grain that to-day is a liability because of heavy storage-carrying charges.

THE STABILIZATION EXPERIMENT

In an effort to stabilize grain prices and aid agriculture, then and now suffering from insufficient production returns, Congress appropriated two years ago $500,000,000 to purchase grain, and by so doing has kept from the market 150,000,000 bushels of wheat now held in storage. The best farm experts urged that course on Congress when it so acted, but the Government now finds itself carrying a vast quantity of grain at an annual storage expense of over $7,000,000, with no opportunity to release it for sale without breaking present low market prices. When grain is high all other products, including livestock, are benefited from the farm viewpoint, but artificial stimulation in this case has not solved the problem. This bill, as stated, proposes to use 40,000,000 bushels of that stored grain for distribution by the Red Cross to feed hungry American people.

Recent bills authorizing approximately $200,000,000 for farm loans through farm-loan agencies and aiding banks to secure credits whereby to make local farm loans are temporary, emergency expedients.

Measures to provide seed-grain loans for farms and aid to drought sections with other needed help have also been passed by Congress during the present session.

Every measure in fact before the Agricultural Committee, including the 40,000,000 grain bushels, donated to relieve hungry people and reduce storage charges on that Government grain, has been passed, in an effort to relieve the situation and, directly or indirectly, to serve the great farming industry.

With purpose to give brief but exact agricultural-aid data, I am submitting a letter from the able and distinguished chairman of the Agricultural Committee of the House, Chairman JONES:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES, COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D. C., March 8, 1932.

Hon. JAMES A. FREAR,
House of Representatives.

DEAR FRIEND: Referring to your request for a brief statement of the important measures affecting agriculture that have been passed by the Congress during the last session and the present session to date, will say that during the last session Congress, among other measures, passed Senate Joint Resolution 117, providing $7,000,000 for the relief of farmers in the storm, flood, and drought stricken areas of a number of States, and Senate Joint Resolution 11, providing $45,000,000 for a similar purpose, and Congress also passed Public Law 867, amending the oleomargarine law, to provide a 10-cent tax on butter substitutes when colored in any shade of yellow. It also passed Public Law No. 772, amending the United States warehouse act in such way as to make it more workable. It passed Public Law No. 69, further extending the work of the agricultural extension department and making further provision for the land-grant colleges.

There were also some other minor measures.

Since the present Congress convened it has passed House Joint Resolution 292, carrying $10,000,000 for the purpose of aiding in establishing agricultural-credit corporations and livestock-loan companies, so as to enable them to utilize the intermediate credit banking system. This will furnish a longer time credit, more suited to the needs of agriculture and the livestock business. It has passed an act making funds available to the Federal land banks for the purpose of enabling them in worthy cases to extend the time of payment of delinquent installments on loans which those banks have made to farmers.

The Congress set aside $50,000,000 in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation measure for the purpose of making loans to individual farmers for production purposes. This amendment also stipulated that they should receive a pro rata part of the expansion of this corporation, which may add not to exceed $150,000,000 additional to this fund. In fact, I understand this expansion has already acted upon $25,000,000 in addition to the $50,000,000 for this purpose. These loans will be made on the crop as security.

Then within the last few days the House has passed a measure for distributing not to exceed 40,000,000 bushels of wheat now held by the Stabilization Corporation, a portion of which is to be used for feed for livestock in the 1931 crop-failure areas.

Some incidental phases of other legislation have also been in the interest of agriculture, but the above measures were primarily for this purpose.

In this connection may I express to you my appreciation for your cooperation in these matters.

Sincerely yours,

MARVIN JONES.

Under the Constitution Congress can not distribute public funds raised by taxation beyond limited aid to relieve hungry, jobless millions. That it has sought to do in the present business depression, and with all measures to aid agriculture the committees have had before them farm-organization representatives who have equally at heart the interests of agriculture, and in many cases are practical farmers.

A long and severe depression has existed in every industry that tries men and causes scores of relief measures and experiments to be proposed, only a few of which can be passed by Congress. It is sometimes asked what has been done for agriculture during recent years. As one who has consistently supported many bills to that end, I have offered the brief statement from Chairman JONES affecting agricultural legislation. The district I represent is largely agricultural, and it is a truism that agriculture must be successful if the country prospers. Beyond that fact I am familiar with the meaning of "farm losses," and speak from personal knowledge of present farm conditions.

A MACHINERY AGE

Agricultural experts and other authorities seek to explain these conditions by pointing out that this is an age of machinery, where one with machinery to-day can do as much work as 10 men did a half century ago when lands were being first settled. Machinery has caused overproduction in practically every labor industry, and is in part held responsible for the present depression. Other authorities claim our monetary system needs overhauling, but our people are not affected as seriously as many other people to whom inflation of currency has not brought the promised relief. Russian competition in the world's grain market is another argument to explain reduced exports of our surplus wheat; but 42 cents tariff protection on wheat, almost its full value, with like high protection against other agricultural imports, has left our home market practically confined to home producers.

We are advised by the Tariff Commission that practically no farm products are now imported, but that result may have deprived us of a portion of our foreign consumers who formerly bought our goods when possible to exchange in trade. In like manner oil, copper, cotton, and other commodities have been badly depressed by over production and world business conditions.

Congress has never been unmindful of its greatest industry, but economic conditions are not to be cured by legislation alone.

The Fordney tariff bill had for its agricultural subcommittee Representatives HAWLEY, Houghton, later ambassador to Great Britain, and myself. With the aid of the Tariff Commission we sought to make effective in every particular when that bill was passed all items in the agricultural schedule and no changes to my recollection were made by the general committee from our subcommittee report and recommendations. In that bill was passed the flexible tariff provision which permits the President during an interim between sessions to increase tariff schedules 50 per cent if need be. That provision was later acted under by the President in fixing increased agricultural protection, occasioned by changed conditions abroad.

Pursuant to President Hoover's recommendation to again readjust agricultural schedules, the Hawley tariff bill last session gave to farm products added protective duties. Tariff duties have preserved to agriculture first of all our domestic market, the most valuable in the world for our own agricultural producers, but competition in the outside field was never more keen that it is to-day.

DAIRY INTERESTS PROTECTED

Duties on dairy products have been repeatedly raised to meet cheap production abroad. When in Denmark several years ago I studied cooperative butter and bacon factories and methods. That country controls the neighboring English market, but its surplus dairy products are no longer dumped on our own market, due to tariff protection given by the measures I have referred to. The large Danish Government creamery a few miles distant from Copenhagen is a model in its appointments known everywhere to the industry, yet among hundreds of factories in my own district there are two that rival any in the world, both in size and completeness, and one is a replica of the Danish Government factory.

While we preserve our own market for the great output of milk and cream that has been produced and is consumed per capita in constantly growing quantities, America's manufactured dairy products are known and sold the world over. In Athens, Greece, ice cream served on the legation table, we were told, was from "Carnation Milk." Over at Kazan, in farthest Soviet Russia, Senator LADD called attention to cans on the shelf of a small shop which disclosed that "Elkhorn Condensed Milk," from my own State, was sold by the shopkeeper, who bought his supplies when the American Relief Association closed its relief work.

Green County, on the southern border of my State, with its 150 cheese factories, was originally settled by the hardy Swiss people, who found a climate akin to that of Switzerland when they landed in Wisconsin. Green County now manufactures more Swiss cheese than all Switzerland combined, and the atmosphere of the Alps transplanted to the Badger State, with the skill and experience of their mother country, has now made the Swiss product of Wisconsin equal if not superior to the imported article.

I have digressed briefly in referring to Wisconsin's great dairy industry to call attention to an apprehended danger which has affected practically every other American industry, from oil to wheat and corn and cotton to copper—the problem of overproduction. Competition now produces the highest-grade dairy products ever known, but a struggle for existence has crowded the field so that threats of overproduction have also reached that industry.

From the secretary of the National Dairy Union I quote a letter that briefly sets forth benefits received through recent congressional legislation to the great dairy interests of the country, among which Wisconsin is a leading State and in part a beneficiary. He writes:

THE NATIONAL DAIRY UNION,
Washington, D. C., March 5, 1932.

Hon. JAMES A. FREAR,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. FREAR: As I promised you yesterday, I am stating below very briefly some of the activities in recent congressional sessions which have been of real benefit to the dairy industry.

You may not care to use what I may say about the tariff situation, but, in my judgment, the tariff on dairy products has been of great importance. I am referring to the duties which were placed on milk, cream, casein, butter, cheese, evaporated and condensed milk and cream, and dried milk and cream. In particular in the recent period of declining foreign-exchange rates, tariffs on butter and cheese have been of great protective value. We are now concerned over the low price of butter, but it is a matter of record that if we had not had the 14-cent duty on butter and practically equivalent duties on the other dairy products our prices would have been forced down many months ago by the new conditions created by depreciation of foreign currencies. In my judgment, present prices would be considerably lower than they are now were it not for the existing tariffs on dairy products. A comparatively higher level of dairy-product prices can be maintained in the United States than would exist in foreign countries if ordinary care is exercised by units in the dairy industry not to unwisely expand the production of milk on farms.

Congress has also greatly benefited agriculture by the enactment of the Haugen-Norbeck oleomargarine amendment in 1930 and the Brigham-Townsend amendment in 1931. The production of cheap vegetable-oil cooking fat compounds made in imitation and semblance of butter was completely stopped by the first-named measure, probably adding from twenty-five to fifty million pounds new market for butter. The result of the second bill, which settled all questions about yellow oleomargarine being exempt from the 10-cent tax, has been to practically eliminate yellow oleomargarine from the market, making a considerable increase in the market for butter and also operating to greatly reduce the total amount of all oleomargarine made and sold during the past year.

The decline in oleomargarine production and sale has increased the market for butter by approximately 75,000,000 pounds.

These acts of Congress for the benefit of the dairy industry have resulted also in increasing very greatly the market for all of the wheat by-products, coarse grain, and forage produced by other farmers, particularly in increasing the market for cottonseed meal, a by-product of the cotton industry, so that at the present time the prosperity of the dairy industry has made it a consumer of cotton products to the extent of at least one and three-quarter million tons of cottonseed meal, valued at between thirty-five and forty million dollars, a product which only 30 years ago was practically a waste product to the southern farmer.

Yours sincerely,

A. M. LOOMIS, Secretary.

Every industry, including agriculture, is in need of revival. The consuming power has been reduced far below normal, but when this situation, which is world-wide, is studied, financial and economic experts point out other business depressions in past years that were genuine panics, which left stings far worse than the present one.

RESPONSIBILITY FOR CONDITIONS

It is a common belief that those in particular industries alone have suffered, whereas none in any line of business have escaped losses. The fact that banks have failed throughout the country, with idle mills and factories swelling the vast army of unemployed, is mute testimony that all have suffered. The old adage that a penny saved is a penny earned was forgotten during our days of extravagance when everyone lived for the day alone and had many luxuries that have now become necessities. Every individual must face the problem of living within one's means. Congress has acted upon every suggestion of the administration without partisanship. Republicans and Democrats on economic measures have joined hands in efforts to bring back good times and put business back on a sound basis, lost to sight when the crash came.

It is useless to speculate as to any exact responsibility for conditions. A great war debt and constant, permanent expenditures of three-fourths of our entire revenues for interest on war bonds held by the people and a sinking fund for payment of bonds, pensions, and hospitalization of those in the war are all part of the war burden easily understood. In these days of peace approximately $800,000,000 annually for the Army and Navy, or nearly 20 per cent of the Government's total expenditures, is another reminder of war and the war spirit. Pressure on Congress for all these activities and obligations and others of like character was never more heavy than during these days when the Federal Treasury is seeking to collect taxes and revenues with which to run the Government.

WHAT CONGRESS AND THE COUNTRY FACES

It is an astounding situation when we are informed by the Treasury Department that with annual Government expenditures of $4,000,000,000 the total Treasury receipts in 1931 dropped to $3,317,000,000, or over 20 per cent, and that 1932 receipts are estimated at only $2,242,000,000, or a drop of over 40 per cent below running expenses of the Government. We are confronted in this Congress with bills which call for $30,000,000,000, covering every conceivable subject, with powerful lobbies in Washington demanding passage of the particular bills which they are employed to urge, while a drastic tax bill is soon to be reported that will be the heaviest ever called for in peace times.

This tax is only to balance the $4,000,000,000 annual Budget expenses. We should keep in mind that if 10 per cent of the $30,000,000,000 proposals before Congress are adopted, tax bills paid by the American public will be far heavier than any now in the making.

Normal times are desired, but never in all history have so many vast expenditures been proposed, most of which may be meritorious but must wait wherever possible until the present business depression is over. Governments like individuals must live within their incomes, otherwise the same fate that comes to one goes to the other.

As before stated, Congress can not, constitutionally, give away Federal revenues received from taxes and other income to any special industry or to all industries. It can and does loan money through responsible agencies on approved security, with a purpose of benefiting all the people—not a limited few as is sometimes believed.

LOANS THAT BENEFIT ALL INTERESTS

A bank that has abundant securities in normal times can not convert all its securities into cash to meet withdrawals of deposits and also maintain a banking business. Its business is to loan out the money of depositors. Many solvent banks of the country when suddenly faced by withdrawals of anxious depositors have been unable to convert "frozen securities" into cash.

The closing of a bank in any community affects hundreds of depositors, and sometimes many thousands, depending on the size of its banking business. A closed bank affects every other bank and indirectly every industry in the community through fear of other disasters and often results in closed mills, additional unemployment, and reduced consumption. That is a national complaint to-day which Congress has sought to relieve by credit relief.

Partisanship has been absent in this effort to bring back hoarded money into circulation and thus to relieve banks, agriculture, other industries, and unemployment, by advancing funds on approved securities. This governmental effort to meet an unprecedented emergency, a depression now world-wide in its scope, does not permit the Government acting through Congress to loan public funds without adequate security, nor is it a public policy to establish a permanent dole system like that which burdens tax-ridden England.

There is, however, wide distinction between a dole and emergency aid necessary to feed hungry men, women, and children by the Government and to aid the jobless. That is certainly a proper function of the Government.

Practically unanimous action on all recent legislation by Congress affords no political assets or liabilities in this general purpose to aid those in immediate need.

Nor is there any particular distinction between supplying coffee or milk with bread or other needed food and granting relief by bread alone. Yet there are those who will willingly give this 40,000,000 bushels of grain to relieve hunger who would protest violently against appropriating its value in money for food purchases, through a professed fear of establishing a permanent dole.

Mr. Speaker, I do not know that anyone in my State will get any benefit from this 40,000,000-bushel wheat bill if it passes. I do not know that the Red Cross is feeding any of our people. I do know, however, the committee report states that the Red Cross is regularly feeding a million people in the United States and has been doing so for several months. I know also that if any Member will walk up and down Pennsylvania Avenue at night he will see several hundred men, less than four blocks from the Capitol, standing in front of the "Mission" waiting to be fed—not down-and-outers, but many of them hungry men without jobs. I believe in this bill for that reason. It is a proper measure for us to pass to give needed relief to hungry people. It takes only about one-quarter of the grain that the Government has in storage, and it ought to be used for this purpose. In fact, we should use more grain for that purpose rather than have it mold away in storage elevators at an annual cost of 18 cents per bushel.

I rose particularly to say on this right to give that when Russia was in dire need in 1921 we gave $20,000,000 to her starving people. Two years later I went down the Volga River some 600 miles through the famine region, where 3,000,000 people had died from starvation, and saw the effect of our gift and learned the gratitude of those people. They were grateful and very happy because, though late to the rescue, America had saved other millions from famine. They lost 3,000,000 lives before we could give the needed aid. If we can feed Russia and other countries in great emergencies, as we have in the past, and ought to have done in the name of humanity, there is not the slightest danger in the world from a dole when we are now seeking to take care of our own. That is why I am in favor of the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDRESEN].

Mr. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting a report from the Red Cross.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, there appears to be no particular opposition to this legislation. When the question first came up before the Committee on Agriculture it was presented by several Members of Congress who were not able to make any particular showing as to the necessity for the passage of the legislation at that time. The chairman of the Red Cross, Judge Payne, also appeared before our committee and indicated that the Red Cross had no expression to make as to the necessity or nonnecessity for the passage of the legislation, but that they were willing to take on the work and distribute the wheat and flour throughout the United States. The committee was criticized for its action and failure to report the bill about two weeks ago. This criticism was not justified, because the members of the committee felt that before they took action it would be necessary to have some definite information as to the necessity for distributing 10,000,000 barrels of flour.

Judge Payne, of the Red Cross, indicated that they were able to take care of the needy people throughout the United States in all communities under 25,000 population. He stated that the President's organization and other organizations were taking care of the destitute in communities of over 25,000 in population, and that he felt that the Red Cross was doing a good job. He said that if Congress wanted to impose upon the Red Cross the responsibility of the distribution of this wheat, he would take the job and do the best his organization could. He appeared before our committee a few days ago in behalf of this new legislation and gave us a complete report on conditions as his organization found them throughout the country. He stated that the Red Cross was now taking care of people in approximately 2,000 counties of the United States, that they were receiving contributions in commodities, clothing, and money to take care of the needs of these people. He brought out the question of relief where that was being done by their organization in the States of North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana, Washington, and Nebraska in taking care of the livestock where the owners of the livestock were unable to secure adequate feed.

This bill has a twofold purpose. In the first place, it provides food for human beings, and, in the second place, it provides for feed for livestock. Both go hand in hand with the obligation that we have here to take care of both human beings and animals. I believe Congress should pass the legislation without a dissenting vote.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDRESEN. Yes.

Mr. KETCHAM. In his discussion of the way in which the Red Cross distributes relief of this sort do you recall the statement made by Mr. Payne as to the interpretation of livestock? It does not mean indiscriminate livestock but simply foundation livestock, that which is primarily necessary for the maintenance of human life.

Mr. ANDRESEN. That is correct. Up to the present time the Red Cross has been taking care of the family cow. The passage of this legislation will give them further authority to go ahead and supply the necessary feed in communities throughout the entire United States, feeding the livestock where the owners are unable to get feed.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDRESEN. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. In cases where the family cow supplies milk for the family and chickens supply eggs for the family, both of them being essential for the proper nutrition of children, indirectly you will feed the children, especially on the farms, by supplying the farmer with something with which he can keep up his supply of food.

Mr. ANDRESEN. That is correct.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Is the Stabilization Corporation which owns this wheat at the present time in sympathy with this movement? They have made no statement.

RED CROSS CARES FOR 1,000,000 PERSONS; AID GIVEN IN DROUGHT, UNEMPLOYMENT, FLOODS

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 21.—Red Cross aid in drought, floods, unemployment, and other distress has reached approximately 1,000,000 people during the past few months, John Barton Payne, chairman, said to-day.

More than 150,000 persons, in two disaster areas alone, are on the relief rolls to-day, Chairman Payne said. These are in the flooded sections in Mississippi and Louisiana, and in drought-stricken regions in five northwestern States.

In summarizing the relief work carried on by the national organization and its chapters during the fall and winter months up to February 15 the following facts were made public by the Red Cross:

The National Red Cross administered relief to 153,236 people in two major disasters and four minor catastrophes. Red Cross chapters aided 872,662 persons. The Red Cross gave relief in almost every State and in approximately two-thirds of the 3,000 counties in the Nation.

Under a policy of relief established by Chairman Payne last September, 1,863 Red Cross chapters are participating in unemployment relief. Of these, 324 chapters are the family-welfare agency in their community. Other chapters have enlarged their services to veterans. Types of relief given for the unemployed by still other chapters are the collection and production of clothing, providing hot lunches in schools, conducting central clearing house of relief cases, making family investigations for other agencies, furnishing milk for preschool children, and aiding transients.

The drought-relief work in five Northwestern States—Montana, North and South Dakota, Nebraska, and Washington—would rate as a major catastrophe in normal times. Red Cross workers have 110,471 persons on their relief rolls in 95 counties in the five States. Food, clothing, and other aid have been given in these States since last October, and to date $1,148,468 has been expended by the Red Cross in the five States. In addition, 356 carloads and 209 other shipments of foodstuffs, clothing, etc., with an approximate value of $265,539, were donated by neighbors in near-by States and in unaffected counties within their own borders for Red Cross distribution.

The grasshopper plague added to prolonged drought caused great distress in these Northwestern States, and last August the Red Cross, recognizing the situation, prepared to meet the human needs, Judge Payne said. Snowbound conditions characterize the winter months, so relief committees were set up in central points, with volunteers making investigations and reporting needs.

Families are given grocery orders on merchants whom they designate as their regular tradesmen, and supplies have usually been furnished for a month or longer period. Grocery orders cover a choice of up to 30 items and a balanced diet is provided, including such items as canned tomatoes, dried fruits, canned salmon, special diet for invalids, milk for children, fresh meats, coffee, etc. Large stores of apples and potatoes were available, as the Red Cross was given, in several instances, an orchard of apples and acres of white potatoes, and chapters did the harvesting. The peak of the drought relief in these States has not yet been reached.

A second disaster of large proportions was the flooding of tributaries of the Mississippi River in northern Louisiana and northern Mississippi. In 20 counties involved the National Red Cross and chapters are to-day feeding or otherwise caring for 35,100 people. The water is receding, but it will be some time before the Red Cross is relieved of the care of these people.

In minor tornadoes which struck communities in Alabama, Mississippi, and Arkansas 470 people were helped; in Idaho forest-fires relief was given, and flooded streams in eastern Kentucky called for national relief by the Red Cross.

Indian families numbering 5,900 persons, who are not Government wards, also are being fed by the Red Cross. These, together with Indians previously cared for this winter, called for total appropriations by the National Red Cross of $191,000. Snowbound farmers in two counties in New Mexico faced with famine are being aided by the National Red Cross.

In addition to the specific activities mentioned Chairman Payne stated that the Red Cross, in carrying on its campaign against pellagra, supplied yeast to several thousand persons and also had begun the distribution of garden seeds in the flooded sections in the South.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. NELSON].

Mr. NELSON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, as a general proposition I am opposed to legislation of this kind. I have always objected to making a Santa Claus of Uncle Sam. But after listening to the testimony of my colleagues, Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON, of South Dakota, Mr. HALL, of North Dakota, Mr. JOHNSON, of South Dakota, Mr. WILLIAMSON, of South Dakota, Mr. CAMPBELL, of Iowa, Senator BULOW, of South Dakota, and others, I was convinced that in this great emergency, when men, women, and children are suffering for food and when livestock is dying of starvation, all of us may consistently support such legislation.

The able chairman of this committee [Mr. JONES] has so eloquently said that each home in America is a service station. This bill seeks to make of each home also a filling station, a place where the hungry may be fed.

When I think of the farmers of the Dakotas who are the victims of grasshoppers, drought and snow, and the Farm Board, my sympathy goes out to them. Their problem consists largely in keeping livestock alive, which, because of ruinous prices, would not pay the cost of marketing. Why, after paying the cost of shipping a cowhide there would not be left the price of a pair of leather shoestrings.

Since this Congress met much has been done for the big corporations of the country. We have gone far in looking after Europe. I agree with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] in the thought that he expressed a few moments ago. It is time for us to look after the home folks first. We gave to Europe—but not by my vote—a debt holiday of a year on $250,000,000. There is to be taken out of the Federal Treasury—but not by my vote—$500,000,000, perhaps $2,000,000,000, principally for the great corporations of the country.

So under the circumstances I shall support this bill. It is better than when originally drafted, better than if it contained some of the features which have been proposed. The Grain Stabilization Corporation is to be credited not with what the wheat cost but only with what it is worth at the date of delivery—a big difference.

A provision in this bill makes it possible to use a considerable part of the grain for feed for livestock. On my own farm back in Missouri and on many farms are small mills for grinding grain. So if more wheat can be turned into feed for livestock, more of the stored wheat, which is being held in storage at a cost of 18 cents or more a year, may, let us hope, be removed. In this respect it is also a kind of Farm Board relief bill. It may help take out of the picture a part of that one-third of a billion bushels of wheat that the Farm Board or its subsidiaries bought, almost half of which it still holds and is anxious to get rid of, wheat which is depressing the price of every bushel the farmer has to sell.

My sympathy goes out to the overtaxed farmers, and especially so when they are selling eggs at 10 to 12 cents per dozen and choice hogs at 3¼ cents per pound. May I digress here just to say that the overtaxed farmer, if the press correctly reports as to what the Ways and Means Committee is doing, is to be more heavily taxed in the future? It is unthinkable to me that we should at this time be asked to write into the tax laws of our country a sales tax, the most iniquitous, the most unfair tax that was ever proposed. The farmer in the stricken regions of South Dakota and elsewhere will be called upon to pay his part of that tax when he buys a pair of overalls, when he buys farm machinery, or whatever he buys. So will every man, even the unemployed, feel the burden. This sales tax, if written into the bill and approved by the Congress, will be based not on a man's ability to pay but on his necessity to buy. Its acceptance would represent the abandonment of a memorable reform which the Democratic Party made possible not so many years ago under the administration of Woodrow Wilson. Its adoption will mean that the camel's nose is in the tent and that soon the whole ungainly beast will be there, and there to stay.

I hope that the Ways and Means Committee, which is understood to have rejected so many objectionable administration proposals, including a tax on automobiles, trucks, and accessories, and a stamp tax of 2 cents on each check and draft, may yet see fit to omit from the revenue bill any general manufacturers' sales-tax provision. [Applause.]

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCCLINTIC].

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, this legislation seeks to turn over 40,000,000 bushels of wheat to the American Red Cross for the purpose of aiding those who are in destitute circumstances and preventing livestock in certain sections of the United States from starving. I have witnessed a photograph which shows dead stock that have actually starved to death this winter. In the past I have seen devastated areas brought about by insects, droughts, floods, and storms. It matters not in what part of the country this kind of desolation exists, I am always going to support legislation that has for its purpose aiding any class of people that can not help themselves.

I want to congratulate the chairman and the members of the committee for the fine motives which prompted them to bring in this legislation. I know that since I have been a Member of Congress our Government has extended aid to European countries. At one time $100,000,000 was appropriated to take care of the destitute in Europe. At another time $20,000,000 was furnished to Russia to prevent its citizens from starving. We have given an immense amount of food, and always extended a friendly ear to every cry of distress regardless of where it came from. Therefore I take the position that the same kind of consideration should be given to the unfortunates in this country as has been extended to those abroad. In the past some of the worthy citizens I have the honor to represent have found themselves unable to provide the bare necessities of life, and when this condition was presented to me I made subscriptions to the Red Cross and, in addition, sent several hundred dollars to various American Legion posts to be used in any way that their officials saw fit in aiding the needy.

When I heard that the California Fruit Growers' Exchange was going to destroy a lot of its surplus fruit I sent urgent telegrams asking that they not do so but instead furnish this to our poor, hungry people, having in mind that there were many who were undernourished and that this fruit would be exceptionally beneficial to the children and those who were sick. Because of my request five carloads of fruit were distributed through the Red Cross, and the people of the seventh district of Oklahoma received their proportionate share. Many residing in Oklahoma may have to receive aid this year, and if the Red Cross can be furnished with free wheat it will render great service in taking care of emergency conditions.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTINGTON].

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest a practical aspect of this humanitarian measure. It is not accurate to say that the wheat involved is owned by the Federal Farm Board or the Federal Government. There are primary loans in favor of the intermediate credit banks and other financial institutions amounting to at least 32 cents a bushel on all of the wheat now in the hands of the Grain Stabilization Corporation. We might as well understand that the passage of this measure involves, or may involve, the expenditure of approximately $14,000,000 from the Federal Treasury. Now that statement has no terrors for me when it comes to the relief of human suffering, but I am vitally concerned in not impairing the integrity of the revolving fund to the credit of the Federal Farm Board. I suggest that it is no answer to say that the value of this wheat will be absorbed in the next three years, for that contemplates a continuance for the next three years of the present depression and the present low price of wheat. So I suggest, Mr. Chairman, an amendment to section 3 of the bill that will provide for an authorization to reimburse the revolving fund of the Federal Farm Board, for otherwise the unobligated part of that fund, now less than $50,000,000, will be impaired to the detriment of the farmers of every State in the Union. This is a practical matter and practical matters must be considered with humanitarian questions.

I repeat for emphasis that when we vote this measure we are voting for a Federal donation. You may not call it a dole, but it is nothing more nor less than a donation from the Federal Treasury, and if permitted to remain in its present shape, this bill will constitute a serious impairment of the revolving fund to the credit of the Federal Farm Board. Congress has already appropriated the sum of $500,000,000, the full amount authorized by the agricultural marketing act, as a revolving fund for the Farm Board. When the board pays the outstanding primary loan, to make the wheat available, the payment can only be made from the revolving fund, which will be diminished, without the reimbursement proposed in the amendment which I shall offer. I want to help the needy, but I do not want to hurt the farmer. Both the authorization and the reimbursement are necessary to maintain the revolving fund to promote agriculture.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. EVANS].

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Chairman, I am grateful to the committee which brought out this bill. In the early part of the session I introduced a bill providing for transferring from this corporation 50,000,000 bushels of wheat. I have no pride of authorship in the matter, and I will as cheerfully vote for this bill as if it were my own bill, but I want to make some suggestions.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. CLARKE] suggested in his comment upon this matter that some of the States in distress should be more active themselves in taking care of their own, and, if necessary, they should change their constitutions to meet such emergency. Pride naturally deters a man from displaying to this House so unfortunate a condition as exists in our several sections. I have hesitated to say in public what I have many times said in private in the last two or three months about conditions in my own State. My home pride, the pride of my people, and my State have deterred me.

I am now going to recite some facts to you. I took the trouble to make a compilation by calling upon the county treasurers of my State. I submitted a questionnaire. Among other questions I asked them: "How many taxpayers were on your roll for 1931? How many of these taxpayers defaulted?"

I am going to recite some of those things to show you that the condition is so deplorable that we could not help ourselves. About 50 of these questionnaires were returned, and I submit herewith the result. It will be observed that in one county—and thank God, it was the worst—out of 4,700 taxpayers 3,673 defaulted, almost 80 per cent. In my own county of Missoula and which, by the way, is considered as stable a county as there is in the State, 1,538 taxpayers out of a total of 6,900 defaulted. In other words, 1,538 people who after years of struggle had acquired enough property to appear on the tax rolls were sold out and put in the bread line. The table follows:

Perhaps it will be suggested that this deplorable condition is the result of our own act of wastefulness and improvidence; to some extent that is true. I do not shirk any responsibility for my people. We have been wasteful, extravagant, and improvident, but we only followed the precept and example set us by men in high places in the Government, who should have had and did have infinitely more information on the situation in the country than the average citizen.

Under the stimulation and excitement of official and political prophecy the prices of stocks on the exchanges soared and expanded. Statements from the White House and other sources that business was sound induced innocent and guileless investors to believe that the drunken revel of speculation was but the sober progress of sound business. Almost every class of our citizens invested their savings in stocks. And then like a punctured balloon this inflated boom—inflated with boastful political vaporings—came crashing to earth. Ruin was scattered through the land. Fragments of the wreck were found in every city in the land. The investor paid in cash. His dividends were paid in poverty and despair.

We were told the country was fundamentally sound; that the poorhouse was about to be banished; that we would have a chicken in every pot and two automobiles in every garage, and so spent our substance as you spent yours.

In parts of that northwest country we have suffered from drought for three years; and now, coupled with the depression, we find ourselves all but crushed. We might have withstood the drought or the depression, but we are crushed under the combination. Our cities, municipalities, and counties are on the verge of bankruptcy, and it is doubtful if any financial house would buy our bonds if we should offer them in the market. Our people are not beggars or mendicants; they are a hardy, courageous, self-reliant people, clinging to their homes like ants to a destroyed ant hill without a cry for help. So it does not lie in the mouth of anyone to say we are beggars and should help ourselves.

The committee's report shows the Red Cross was feeding more than 42,000 people in eastern Montana, and my information now is they are feeding more than 50,000, or about 10 per cent of the whole population and 25 to 30 per cent of a large area. North Dakota, and to lesser extent South Dakota and Nebraska, are in the same condition. There are no more hard-working, industrious, patriotic citizens in the United States than these, and they are entitled to the sympathy and consideration of this Congress and the Government. I hope there will not be a vote against this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BEAM].

Mr. BEAM. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I am indeed happy to support a measure of this kind. I feel on due reflection that it is time the Congress of the United States became cognizant of the situation and thoroughly awakened to the situation as it now exists throughout America.

As I read the joint resolution which is before us to-day I recall at the onset of this congressional assembly that when the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] made his speech in the House there was some derision at his remarks, but after a careful survey and after a close analysis of conditions as they now prevail throughout the country I am glad the Congress of the United States is deeply aroused and thoroughly cognizant of the fact that absolute and dire necessity exists and that aid, to be effectual, must be forthcoming very rapidly. [Applause.]

Gentlemen of the Congress, you probably do not know the situation in detail. I wish you could have listened to some of the testimony which was given before the Committee on Agriculture. If you had been able to do so you would be alarmed as to the conditions prevailing in some of our Western States. It was only when this testimony was presented to us in a definite way that we became thoroughly impressed with the idea that these are unusual times, times in which every Member of Congress must realize that aid must be forthcoming.

My friends, the history of nations is built merely upon the stability of their people. If you go back into the pages of history you will find that the earliest fundamental law of every nation was to feed its hungry.

I am from a great metropolitan area—the city of Chicago. I hold no brief for the wheat farmers of Kansas and the Western States. But I am in sympathy with them. I believe that agriculture should prosper, because I realize that if agriculture is not successful big business can not function, and consequently men can not be employed. [Applause.]

However, I ask you to picture conditions in the great metropolitan areas of our country. I am sure the condition which prevails in the city of Chicago prevails in every city of our land. You would realize the seriousness of the situation if you could but see men dispossessed of their homes. The courts of the city of Chicago are clogged with forcible entry and detainer suits. The circuit courts are clogged with foreclosures on homes and buildings. I wish you could see the soup lines and the lines of hungry men in our city and in every city. If you could see these actualities you would become aware of conditions as they exist in our country to-day.

My friends, the history of America has been that it has always fed the foreign poor. If you please, a few years ago we sent over $20,000,000 to feed the hungry in Russia. We appropriated many millions of dollars to feed the hungry German children. We fed the Chinese on the occasion when the great typhoon visited that country. We fed the Belgians; we have passed measure after measure to take care of big business in America; we declared a moratorium for Germany; we have passed legislation for the stabilization and rehabilitation of the banking interests of America, but up to this time we have allowed the rank and file of our people to starve; with apparent indifference from our Federal Government.

My friends, this is a land of plenty, and this is an opportunity for us to become thoroughly aroused and perform an outstanding duty, namely, that of supporting this measure unanimously and in its entirety. [Applause.]

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I have consistently urged that the highest function of government is the preservation of life. Although coming from a city district, I am glad to say that I have always cooperated with the great Committee on Agriculture and in one or two instances have been the only city Member voting with it.

While this bill in and of itself, of course, will not and can not bring about real relief in the cities—and I think it is well to point that out ahead of time, so that there will not be much hope based upon it—it at least establishes a principle that many of us have been fighting for and that is that in periods of distress, when a large number of our population is in need, it is the duty of the Federal Government to step in and bring relief.

In reply to what has been said to-day as to the State constitutions of some of the States that do not permit relief or the failure of State legislatures to meet in order to provide legal relief, I want to say that as far as my State is concerned we have the resources; we have always generously appropriated for our home requirements, but I am sure that I voice the sentiment of the people of my State when I say we are not going to permit any part of our population to remain in want regardless of what the constitution of that State may be. [Applause.] We do not believe in starving a sister State into submission, but we believe in setting a good example, and eventually all States will take proper action. In the meantime no American should be allowed to starve or to suffer bodily hunger.

I want to say to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTINGTON], who properly called to the attention of the House the cost of this wheat, that it will be made up entirely on what the Government will save on storage.

I wonder how many gentlemen on the floor recognize that this wheat is costing us 18 cents a bushel per year for storage? This is a cent and a half storage per bushel per month. The 40,000,000 bushels here provided will mean a saving of $600,000 a month, or $7,200,000 a year. Why, it is prudent business to get rid of it and save the storage, providing, of course, we can do so in an orderly manner without disturbing the farmers' coming crop.

I want to say, gentlemen, that as far as the cities are concerned, we must make a slight amendment. We are so situated in the large cities that we can not possibly use flour. We have not the facilities for baking bread in the tenement houses. The cost of the gas or fuel would be too high. I have an amendment here which will authorize the baking of this flour into bread or other processing into food for distribution. I also provide in the amendment that the cost of the baking shall not be paid with flour, because if you do that, my friends from the farming districts, you will to that extent curtail your sale of the current crop of wheat and of flour. So if you will provide for the giving of the flour to organizations in my city, such as the A. I. C. A., the C. O. S., the Catholic charities, the Hebrew charities, and the Salvation Army, they will find the funds to bake it or process it into food and will care for the proper distribution where it is needed.

Mr. SPARKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. SPARKS. Does the gentleman know what the shrinkage loss is on wheat per year?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No; I do not. I am told the percentage is high. I find, so far as converting wheat into bread is concerned, that 1 bushel of clean wheat will make 42.6 pounds of flour, and from that we can make 62 one-pound loaves of bread. Of course, the shrinkage is another item which must be taken into consideration in figuring the actual cost of this wheat.

Now, gentlemen, please do not get the idea that we are doing very much to relieve distress. The one thing we are doing, I repeat, is to establish the duty of the Federal Government to provide for our people in emergencies and in times of distress. The unemployment situation, with its resultant destitution, is no fault of the people. Our unemployed are willing and able and anxious to work. I also want to point out that providing bread is by no means feeding people. It is only supplemental aid given by the Federal Government. Let no one get the idea that the American people or any part of them can be fed with bread and cereals alone. If conditions continue, if there is not a big improvement in the unemployment situation, soon a much greater appropriation will have to be made for direct relief. And I repeat what I have said so many times on the floor of this House, that Congress can not escape the duty of providing a national system of unemployment insurance to assure economic security to the workers of this country.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GILCHRIST].

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, I represent a district which is within 100 miles of South Dakota. For six or eight weeks past our folks have been shipping corn and other grain free of charge over there to them, and this has been distributed there by private people and not by the Red Cross. We are ready to go on with this same program. I may say that nature has not visited my district with any great holocaust, nor afflicted it with scourge or drought or prevented it from raising at least a fair crop, nor have the grasshoppers visited it to any great extent. We suffer from economic forces and are unable to get fair prices for our products as measured by high-priced dollars. I have in my hand a letter from one of my constituents which discusses the facts surrounding the present bill and shows the conditions which prevail. I read as follows:

> We are constantly receiving letters and calls for help from our friends in South Dakota. They and their stock are starving to death gradually. We had another snow last night. We thought of wiring you, but have not done so. Many have suggested going to Fort Dodge and help load out or, if necessary, take by force the wheat stored in the Quaker Oats elevator (my friend here refers to wheat owned by the Stabilization Corporation which was stored in the Quaker Oats elevators at Fort Dodge). This wheat is gradually being eaten up by storage bills, so the Farm Board has little equity anyway. Mr. ——— was here yesterday and suggested this, for the good Lord knows what little corn we have left will not pay taxes. Millions and billions have been appropriated for the large banks, railroads, and insurance companies, and yet we receive appeals for help from private citizens and men and women who are in want. It is very hard to understand this situation. I read that the ——— railroad got their $18,000,000 loan approved hardly before the bill had passed. I know that you are doing every possible thing you can, but we feel that we would give our last cent and lose our homes rather than have those poor devils in Dakota starve. I, for one, hate to be so embarrassed. It seems to me that if the American Legion is any good at all they will take what wheat they have in Dakota and return it to those it was taken from. Cars of grains have been shipped out from here and from surrounding territory and still we sit without doing anything. I will admit that I am out here in the country and think pretty individually, but just what good is it to pass these billions to business men while our people are starving. Those who appeal to us for help are known to us and are good people.

Mr. Chairman, as soon as I received this letter about two weeks ago I called the facts to the attention of influential men in this Congress and am now well pleased to see such unanimity in support of the present bill. I readily approve of the remarks of the gentleman from Chicago and of the gentleman from New York City who preceded me. I will join with them in each and every feasible plan that will restore jobs to workingmen and prevent their wives from being hungry and their children from crying for bread. After all, the voice which cries for bread is the most plaintive voice known among mankind. Let us still that voice and answer that cry. Gentlemen have stated in this debate that ordinarily they would not be for such a bill as this because it seems to be paternalistic. But after what I have seen and heard in this Congress I do not want anyone to tell me that the Government is not in business. My constituent, whose letter I have quoted, is quite right in saying that the Government has come to the aid of banks, railroads, insurance companies, and mortgage-loan associations. The bills that we have so far passed prove his statements. The Government has already entered many fields of business. The Government has been regulating railroads since 1887. No one now disputes its right to do so nor the wisdom which impels it. The Government is pouring hundreds of millions of dollars into rivers, harbors, and canals so that business may flow unrestrained down the waterways. It is running barges along these waterways and giving indemnities therefor. The Government went into the shipping business, and we make huge expenditures for the merchant marine. Business men want this. The Government provides costly airway service and subsidizes the air mail. Business men are for this system. Canal building and highway building are common enterprises which business demands shall be conducted by the States and the Federal Government. The tariff itself is a direct restraint upon the natural course of exchange between the countries of the world. The Federal Farm Board is an example of this very thing, and it has developed cooperation as distinguished from individualism among farmers. Since we have come here this session we have passed many bills whereby the Government is supporting this or that or the other business. So, Mr. Chairman, I have come to the conclusion that almost everybody wants to have the protection and the help and aid of the Government in his own business, although he does not want the Government to aid the other fellow's business. I do not want anyone hereafter to tell this Congress that the Government should not be in the business of ameliorating the suffering of mankind. We have not yet given any direct aid to the man who is out of a job. Such aid as he will get from our legislation is indirect aid. We hope, and the theory is, that benefits will be allowed to fall down from above upon him. The same thing is true as to farm relief. We have not given the farmer any direct benefit except as benefits may be extended to him and allowed to fall down upon him from above. This bill will aid mankind. It should be passed unanimously. [Applause.]

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURTNESS].

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, when a few weeks ago it was reported that the Committee on Agriculture had voted adversely to legislation similar to this I was disappointed, and I did take the opportunity of making my views known to some of the members of the committee, for I thought there was much merit in the legislation and that they might not have been fully advised. I am therefore very much pleased with the favorable action taken by the Agricultural Committee this week.

There are many things that might be appropriately said to-day as to its various aspects. I am somewhat like the distinguished gentleman from Montana [Mr. EVANS] in that I do not like to parade before the public the difficulties that exist in some portions of the Northwest—the result of poor farm prices and of unprecedented crop failures. I do, however, feel that we have some things to be proud of out there in the Northwest.

Incidentally, I might mention that in all probability none of the relief provided in this bill will come to that portion of the State which I happen to represent, but some of it, I hope, will go into other sections of the State, into Montana and into portions of South Dakota, Nebraska, and elsewhere, as well as provide for food that will go into the great industrial cities of this country, where there is need for it—for the unfortunate armies of unemployed.

I have been asked at times what we ourselves have done out there in the Northwest and, as I say, I am proud of the fact that we have done our best. During the fall we organized our communities, townships, villages, and cities as well as we were organized back in the war days. We went out and we passed the hat among our own people and in my State, which last year had a fair crop only in two or three counties of the State, the people raised $200,000 in cash and turned those funds over to the Red Cross for relief work in our State. [Applause.]

In other words, the neighbors of those unfortunate enough to lose their crops gave willingly of what they had, and they did so at a great sacrifice. We in North Dakota did not originate any demands for outright assistance from the Government. We are trying earnestly to take care of our own people, and while many have had to live on a lower standard than that to which they are used, I believe very few, if any, have been forced to go cold or hungry. Every community, even those in the drought-stricken areas, did its fair share.

From the eastern part of the State we sent to the western portion of North Dakota and to Montana about 400 carloads of potatoes and mixed vegetables, as well as many carloads of clothing and supplies of various sorts. I am rather proud of the unselfish accomplishments of the people of my State, and also of the contributions made by the people of the neighboring States out there in the Northwest. They will stand as an inspiration to what is best in mankind for many years to come.

Now, with reference to this bill, some Members have spoken as to what it may do to the wheat market, and what it will cost the Government. I want to emphasize the fair statement made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], as to the saving of $7,200,000 a year in storage on the wheat held by the Stabilization Corporation. Yes, I want to say to him that he can, in fact, fairly multiply that figure about two and a half times. The important thing from the wheat growers' viewpoint, as well as the viewpoint of industry, is to restore the buying power of agriculture through an increase in price. An important thing, therefore, is to get all of this grain out of the show case, so that there may be a better price situation, which in turn will soon result in signs of general prosperity returning.

Why did I say that this bill will save two and a half times the amount stated by the gentleman from New York, or more than $21,000,000? Remember the policy of the Farm Board is to sell only 5,000,000 bushels of wheat a month, and it would take three years to get rid of all of its present holdings of about 150,000,000 bushels at that rate.

Mr. HOPE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTNESS. I yield.

Mr. HOPE. The gentleman's figures are based on the assumption that the present price of wheat will continue.

Mr. BURTNESS. Not altogether so, but partly so. I regret to have to say that as far as the present prospects are concerned, there seems to be very little likelihood that the price of wheat will increase greatly for a long time to come. It is just as sensible to assume that there will not be any great improvement as to assume that there will be. In any event, we have the wheat on hand. It costs money to carry it. Storage for three years will amount to as much as its present value. People and half-starved livestock need it. Its retention in the hands of the agency of the Farm Board will depress market prices for months, if not years, to come. The practical thing to do is to turn it over to the Red Cross for these humanitarian purposes. Consumption will be increased to some extent at least, thus tending to improve market conditions when the next crop comes on. The public burden will be lightened in every community to which it goes.

In spite of the few objections raised, let us approve it almost unanimously. [Applause.]

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. GARBER].

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks, and to include therein statements and such tables as may be material.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, while there is a diversity of views in reference to the extension of assistance by the Government, yet when you come to analyze this diversity of opinion, you will readily find that the membership of this House is almost unanimous in its desire to extend assistance, when the need is shown to warrant such action by the Government.

We have the conservative element taking the view that under no conditions should the Government extend assistance in cases of this kind. On the other hand, we have a radical element that would go to the other extreme and ruthlessly appropriate the tax moneys of the people for all purposes regardless of merit or need.

I take the middle ground, and I believe that it should become the Federal policy of the Government that when the actual need is shown to exist, the Government should step in and assist the citizens in the protection of life and property.

Mr. SHANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. Yes; for a question only.

Mr. SHANNON. I would like to ask the gentleman under what head or group this would come? The President in his message said, "I am opposed to any direct or indirect dole." Is he conservative or radical?

Mr. GARBER. In my judgment, he is neither. He is a well-poised, balanced Executive whose administration under these trying conditions has saved the taxpayers untold millions of dollars which would have been appropriated for the extension of Federal assistance in all directions, regardless of need, if it had not been for the sound policy he adopted.

But the gentleman can secure his own time and present his own interpretation of that portion of the message which he has read.

The President's position, as I understand it, is to extend Federal assistance when need is shown to exist, after the local subdivisions of government and organizations have exhausted their resources. Time has vindicated the wisdom of such a policy as contradistinguished from the dole policy which, if unopposed, would have been adopted long ago by those who favor appropriations regardless of the capacity of the Government to pay and the necessity of economic expenditure of the tax moneys of the people.

The resolution under consideration does not provide a dole. It supplies a temporary need under a great emergency. The adoption of the dole is proceeding along the lines of least resistance, and when once adopted as a part of our economic policy it will be impossible to eliminate it. It destroys the integrity and independence of the individual, increases the load of the Government, and results in a discriminating distribution of public revenue. It is easy enough for political purposes to tear down the moral fabric of restraint and independence which it requires generations to develop. The President's policy, and the one which I approve, has demonstrated its wisdom, and is the one which properly represents the integrity of American citizenship and the course which this Government should pursue.

The resolution under consideration directs the Farm Board to make available, from time to time, as need may be shown to the American National Red Cross, wheat of the Grain Stabilization Corporation for use in providing food for the needy and distressed, and for feed for livestock. Such wheat in quantity to be delivered only upon the approval of the President, to such organizations not exceeding in total an amount of 40,000,000 bushels, no part of the expenses incident to the delivery, receipt, and distribution to be borne by the United States or the Federal Farm Board.

Under the terms of the resolution the wheat may be milled or exchanged for flour or feed without profit to any mill, organization, or other person. The Farm Board is authorized to credit the account of the Grain Stabilization Corporation with an amount equal to the current market value thereof at the time of delivery. This resolution passed the Senate February 24, 1932, and is favorably reported by the House Agricultural Committee, which, in hearings recently held, determined that actual need was sufficiently shown to warrant its favorable report of the resolution.

The House Agricultural Committee is to be commended for refusing its approval until the evidence showed an actual need for the appropriation. Such course was an approval of the policy that local subdivisions of government should supply local needs for relief of the distressed, but when such local needs fail and an actual need is shown for Federal assistance, then it should be extended, and that is the policy adopted by the House Agricultural Committee in its consideration of this resolution.

The need shown in this case was caused by extreme drought and ravages by insects in the Northwestern States, unusual visitations which neither the foresigh nor industry of the farmers of those States could prevent.

The selection of the Red Cross as the distributing agency insures economic distribution without expense. The Red Cross is a noble institution deserving of the grateful appreciation of the American people for its unselfish work and sacrifice in carrying out the relief program during this period of depression.

It is to be regretted that this meritorious measure can not be amended so that the farmers could receive the benefit of the purchase of an equal amount of wheat by the Farm Board. If provision providing for such purchase would be germane to the resolution, I would offer it as an amendment, as such purchase would stimulate the market and benefit the wheat growers without extra cost to the Government or the Farm Board. The hearings show that it is now costing the Farm Board 18 cents per bushel per year to hold the wheat. This 18 cents per bushel would amount to $7,200,000 a year or to $600,000 a month. With wheat selling for 48 cents per bushel, it is readily seen that the storage charge will soon equal the market value of the wheat. In support of this proposal are three telegrams just received from three of the largest wheat agencies in the Southwest, namely, the Oklahoma Wheat Growers Association, the Union Equity Cooperative Exchange, and the Farmers Cooperative Grain Dealers Association.

While the consideration of this resolution evidences the existence of tragic conditions, yet it is with some satisfaction that we can give it our support with the knowledge that it will extend relief direct to the deserving in need.

Hon. M. C. GARBER,
House of Representatives:

Oklahoma Wheat Growers Association supports the resolution now before the House as to the Farm Board giving to the needy of our country 40,000,000 bushels of stabilization wheat, and we do urge that stabilization buy from the market 40,000,000 bushels of wheat to replace the amount donated by the Farm Board to the needy.

ENID, OKLA., March 3, 1932.

Representative M. C. GARBER:

We heartily approve your action toward releasing 40,000,000 bushels Farm Board wheat to American Red Cross for relief purposes. To relieve the congested situation in cash wheat in the Southwest think it very important handle above in a way to have Farm Board replace the 40,000,000 by buying like amount cash wheat in the worst congested area. Very little demand cash wheat or flour at present. Replacing of like amount would stimulate both demand for cash wheat and flour, as well as confidence in the market, aiding the American wheat farmers as well as the unemployed.

UNION EQUITY COOPERATIVE EXCHANGE,
E. N. PUCKETT.
FARMERS COOPERATIVE GRAIN DEALERS ASSOCIATION OF OKLAHOMA,
ROY BENDER, Secretary.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, the disposal of 40,000,000 bushels of wheat as provided in this bill is in no sense a dole. It is a fact, and we know it, that people are hungry, that they are short of food, and that the country is filled with food supplies. I want to speak a word here, not with the idea of making a speech, or even extending my remarks. I live within 40 miles of the city of Buffalo, N. Y. In the city of Buffalo you will see lined up along the break-wall of that city harbor a great fleet of ships, some of them over 500 feet long, in which is stored Federal Farm Board wheat amounting to hundreds of thousands of bushels. I happen to know that it is necessary for the Government, in order to prevent that wheat from spoiling, to have these great vessels towed over to the elevators and then go to the enormous expense of putting a cold blast through all these hundreds of thousands of bushels of wheat to keep it from spoiling. Far from being a dole, we will find ourselves, unless we take some action of this kind, in the position of letting hundreds of thousands of bushels of wheat rot, rapidly deteriorate in the holds of ships, with people begging for food. I want you, gentlemen, to take that into consideration when we vote on this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield now to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORTON].

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, in supporting this resolution at this time I am in a position which is consistent with the position which I have taken in the Committee on Agriculture. When a similar resolution was recently under consideration I voted to report it favorably, and when the pending resolution was reported by the committee I voted in the affirmative.

The purpose of this resolution, as is explained therein, is to authorize and direct the Federal Farm Board to take such action as may be necessary to make available to the American Red Cross such amounts of wheat now held by the Stabilization Corporation, not to exceed 40,000,000 bushels, as may be needed for relief. That is a laudable purpose, and there should be no serious objection to it. The resolution does not alone provide that the wheat be used for human relief, but for the relief of livestock in drought areas where livestock is now dying for lack of necessary feed. There are those who will say that the passage of this resolution would be a new departure for the Federal Government, a setting of a dangerous precedent, because to do so would be unusual. But these are unusual times when unusual measures are necessary to meet an unusual emergency.

That there is hunger and need of food in many parts of the country must be conceded. How could it be otherwise with more than eight millions of people unemployed, and an even greater number employed only part time with insufficient incomes to meet living requirements? Upon those who are unemployed, or who are employed only a part of the time, depend many other millions. What is even more serious, is the fact that in addition to those already enumerated are millions of other men, women, and children who have no one to whom they can look for support, except the public, and who because of age or physical condition could not work, even though given an opportunity to do so. I repeat, that these are unusual times which require unusual measures.

In the consideration of this measure we find the existence of a deplorable situation. On the one hand, we find that the farmers are receiving prices for their products which are not equal to the cost of production, not equal to one-half of that cost; while, on the other hand, are millions who can not buy these food products for lack of the necessary means. In other words, hundreds of thousands of American farmers are losing their farms and their homes because of inadequate prices, due to their surpluses, to enable them to meet operating expenses, living costs, interest, and taxes, while others are starving for lack of food. It is a deplorable fact, I repeat, that in the greatest agricultural Nation in the world the tillers of the soil are being driven from what once were their happy homes, because of the low prices of foodstuff, to the cities, where millions for lack of food are suffering from hunger and want.

Some of those who have expressed opposition to the passage of this resolution have expressed the view that its enactment would be detrimental to the farmers. I am wondering whether some of these defenders of the farmers' welfare really would like to do something for the farmers. If so, are they ready to support the program outlined by organized agriculture, to pass legislation which would give to the farmers prices for their products which would be equal to the cost of production? Are they willing to urge the passage of a farm measure which would contain the "equalization fee," the "export debenture," and the "allotment plan," with a proviso that the Farm Board be required to use one of these provisions so as to effect better prices to the farmers?

It has been stated by some critics of this proposed legislation that the necessary wheat for food purposes in administering relief should be bought upon the open market; that to use the so-called Farm Board wheat would depress the market and consequently the price of wheat for the farmers. With that view I can not agree; but, even if it were true, what farmers would, as a result, be forced to sell their wheat at the reduced price? It certainly would not be the farmers who were seriously in need of better prices last fall when they were forced to sell their crops immediately after harvesting in order to meet, as far as that was possible, expenses and debts which they had incurred.

Would it not be the speculators, in the main, who would stand to lose, because they now hold much of the wheat, and some others who would be in a position to hold the wheat until the depressing influences, which could be only temporary, had passed? I restate, however, that I do not consider that the passage of this resolution would depress prices, for a greater amount of wheat would be consumed, and the effect of that should be to increase rather than to reduce prices.

The passage of this resolution would have another beneficial effect, which gives me an additional reason for favoring it. I maintain that one of two definite steps should be taken in the near future in the interest of agriculture: Either the Farm Board should dispose of the wheat now held by the Stabilization Corporation, before the time of marketing the next crop, so that the huge quantity of wheat now in storage might not remain as a threat over the market, and later probably be sold in competition with the 1932 crop; or the Farm Board should impound the entire amount, less whatever amount might be used for relief, for at least one year, and preferably for two years, so as to remove the present depressing effect of this stored wheat. To do that would not be to establish a new departure, for the Farm Board has already, through an agreement made in the exchange of wheat for coffee, agreed to hold the 1,000,000 bags of coffee to be received off the market for one year from the time the exchange was agreed upon last September.

Many of those who oppose the extension of relief by the Federal Government maintain that it is the duty of the local community, or of the State, to provide the necessary relief. But to extend the relief here suggested would not be a new departure. If our Nation was justified and I think that it was—in extending relief to Belgium, to China, and to Russia in times of hunger and distress; to Tokyo and San Francisco at the time of their earthquakes; to the Mississippi Valley at the time of the Mississippi River flood; to Arkansas and other places in times of drought, would it not be justified in extending relief now to the needy of this country when there is evidence of hunger and want?

The American citizen owes his allegiance and loyalty to the Federal Government as much as to the State or the local community, and is ready to give his all in an emergency, if need be, in its defense. Has he not then the right to expect that that Government should interest itself to the extent of aiding in furnishing shelter, fuel, clothing, and food when he can not secure work, however much he may desire it, so as to earn those necessities for himself? That should be especially true when the conditions which have caused this distressed situation are more the fault of the Federal Government than of the States and of the local communities, due to the stupid policies which the Federal Government has pursued.

To pass this resolution, it has been claimed, would be to provide for the extension of a dole. What constitutes a dole, may I ask? Is it the extension of a dole to furnish food to the hungry and not a dole to extend aid to financial institutions and other organizations of great wealth? Is it a dole to attend to the welfare of the individual American citizen and not a dole to respond to the cry for help from some corporation or other organization in a position of influence and advantage? I can not see how that could be true.

To repeat what has been often stated, there are two schools of thought with reference to government, wherein some of the people believe that government exists primarily for benefits to the privileged classes, while others cling to the view that government exists for service to the masses. With the latter view I agree. I believe that every American citizen, however poor or humble he may be, is entitled to the same protection of the law and the same consideration at the hands of his Government as the person who may sit in the highest position of wealth, of prestige, and of power. It is the solemn duty of the Government to guard the interests of all of the people and not alone the selfish desires of just some of the people. To maintain that position of American justice I trust that this resolution may receive favorable consideration to the end that America's good name may be safeguarded and this Congress may have performed its obligation to a nation's people in a time of great distress.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. LONERGAN].

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Chairman, this is an emergency measure. I favor it and commend the committee for reporting it. If I had my way, all the wheat owned by the Grain Stabilization Corporation would be given for the same purpose, as well as the coffee owned by the Grain Stabilization Corporation. We have in this country 354,000,000 bushels of wheat, 154,000,000 bushels of which are owned by the Grain Stabilization Corporation, and 200,000,000 bushels of which are owned by private interests. It is costing this Government $2,000,000 per month to own this wheat. There are in the country 8,000,000 people who are out of employment. We find cities, particularly in the eastern section of the country, appealing to Congress for unemployment relief. We have an oversupply of the various necessities of life, and yet we find millions of people pleading for those necessities. We have underconsumption and not overproduction. I congratulate the Congress on its proposed action in voting for this measure. Forty million bushels of wheat, when milled, will supply the bread needs of 10,000,000 people for one year. This measure has the approval of Secretary Hyde and of the Farm Loan Board. It should pass without a dissenting vote. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CROWE].

Mr. CROWE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of Senate Joint Resolution 110, authorizing the distribution of 40,000,000 bushels of wheat to the American National Red Cross and other organizations for relief of distress.

I am glad to support this measure. I am glad it is for 40,000,000 bushels. I would support a measure that when this amount has been consumed, to place an additional 40,000,000 bushels at the disposal of the same organizations.

This bill is humanitarian; it reaches those who are deserving; reaches those who, through no fault of their own, are hungry.

This is a crisis of the first magnitude. Various estimates are given of the number of employed, variously estimated from 7,000,000 to 10,000,000 people.

Can this, the richest nation on earth, turn a deaf ear to the hungry and starving?

Can this country, with too much foodstuff, turn away from the hungry mothers and helpless children of this land, and especially when the Federal Farm Board has its millions of bushels of wheat on hand with no apparent market or use for same?

The hearings disclose that it is costing the Federal Government 18 cents a bushel per year for interest, storage, insurance, and so forth, to handle this wheat.

Two to three years would cost the entire value of this wheat in overhead.

When Russia was in distress some years ago we contributed $20,000,000 to aid their hungry. When Belgium was in need we spent millions of dollars to feed their starving. We aid in many ways the nations of the earth, but we seem to get stage fright and fear when we talk of feeding our hungry and unemployed, fearing it will be called a dole. I oppose a dole; our workingmen, that great class of men, the great bulwark of the Nation, oppose a dole; but when their suffering families are hungry for bread, a just Nation with millions of bushels of wheat to spare, must feed its hungry.

Forty million bushels of wheat will probably feed 2,000,000 families with bread for six months. Eighty million bushels likewise would feed 4,000,000 families six months. I favor and I implore Congress and the Red Cross to put on full speed ahead and get the quickest possible action on the distribution of this wheat.

CHARITABLE INSTITUTIONS, COMMUNITY CHESTS, ETC.

We hear considerable talk of the local communities taking care of their needy, which is splendid, and there are hundreds of such organizations doing a great, noble work. However, the funds for these institutions are coming out of the pockets of merchants, business and professional men, bankers, and so forth, men many of whom are unable to contribute more, many of them going into bankruptcy. It is time to give some relief to those agencies by removing some of the load from them.

MEASURE WILL TEND TO STABILIZE PRICE OF WHEAT AND INCREASE THE MARKET PRICE

There is no room for fear in this measure to the miller or elevator man. Our overproduction is to a great extent underconsumption. The unemployed in millions of families are not eating but a very small per cent of what they would eat if they had it. By this method we will use up a great volume of the surplus and that will tend ultimately to increase price on amount then left in the country.

RECHECK TOTAL BUSHELS THEN REMAINING WITH FEDERAL FARM BOARD

I would recommend that after this has been withdrawn to carefully check amount actually on hand after this 40,000,000 bushels has been withdrawn, and after all shrinkage has been accounted for, which is common to grain in storage, the figures will show definitely the amount on hand with the Federal Farm Board.

When our hungry have been fed and the reflection of these figures are shown that a large part of our surplus has been depleted the market price will automatically rise.

HELP THE FARMERS

This will be a tremendous boon to the farming industry. It is one way to give a small measure of relief to them. It is imperative that something must be done for this big part of our population. Until the farmers are given relief and some constructive measures of aid are given them, there can be no hope for any lasting prosperity to our country. I am sincerely for any sound, honest legislation which will give aid to any of the distressed groups of our country. We have helped industry, we have helped the railroads, we have helped the banking interests. It is now apparent that we must give aid and immediate direct help to those of our country who are in dire distress. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman and fellow members of the committee, this bill proposing to turn over to the Red Cross for distribution to the destitute people of America 40,000,000 bushels of wheat now being held in storage by the Federal Farm Board is one that should not, in my opinion, have opposition from any Member on either side of this aisle. The fact is this bill should have been passed the first week of the present session and the destitute and hungry people of the land could have been fed by this surplus wheat all winter rather than wait until spring.

I was amazed at the statement of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADKINS] in defending the unusual delay of action by the committee. If I understood him correctly, he took upon his broad shoulders a large share of responsibility for the delay and said he had no apologies to make for such long procrastination. If I misunderstood or misconstrued what he said, I trust the gentleman will correct me. However, I listened intently to the gentleman who has heretofore so ardently championed the cause of the farmer for an explanation for this long delay in action and was disappointed that he did not choose to give any.

Let me say that in the early part of this session I advocated the passage of this legislation and personally discussed it with the able and distinguished chairman as well as several members of the Agriculture Committee and urged that not only this but that all surplus wheat held by the Farm Board be distributed, if necessary, to feed the unemployed and destitute of the country. The opposition to this legislation has raised the old worn-out cry of a "dole," and we have been reminded that the President in a message to Congress has voiced his opposition to legislation of this kind. I do not propose to quibble over what this measure may be called. I have stated on the floor of this House more than once that I would much prefer to support legislation to provide work for the unemployed and destitute citizens in order that they might be able to feed and clothe themselves, and I still feel that way about it; but this Congress is faced with a terrible and frightful condition of starving and hungry people and not a mere fanciful theory.

There are some eight or ten millions of American citizens without work, and the army of unemployed, instead of diminishing, has grown every week and month for the past two years and more. I am in favor of feeding the hungry and starving, whether they happen to reside on the drought-stricken and grasshopper-infested plains of Minnesota, in the towns and cities of the country, or in the agricultural districts of Arkansas or Oklahoma. A hungry person will not long remain a patriotic citizen. If leaders of Congress will spend less time denouncing the so-called reds and hunger marchers and pass legislation like this to feed their hungry stomachs, that vast army of hungry and discontented will diminish rather than grow with every passing day. [Applause.]

A few moments ago some one raised the question that if this surplus wheat that is stored in warehouses over the country is distributed to the hungry it will actually cost the Government money, inasmuch as the Farm Board has invested about 30 or 32 cents per bushel in it. In answer may I call your attention to the fact that the Farm Board is paying about 18 cents per bushel per year for the storage of this wheat, and therefore the withdrawal of 40,000,000 bushels of the board's wheat, as contemplated in this measure, would make a saving to the Federal Farm Board of more than $7,000,000 per year. Personally I would not hesitate to vote to turn over all the surplus wheat held by the board for distribution to the hungry. I give notice now that I shall offer an amendment at the proper time to strike out 40,000,000 and insert 50,000,000 bushels instead.

I must confess I do not understand why Members of Congress will quibble over this proposal to distribute this surplus grain to the starving and needy of our own people, especially after you have been so magnanimous to foreign countries. You did not raise any objections when Congress made a direct appropriation to feed the starving in China a few years ago, nor did we hear the cry of "dole" when this Government spent some $20,000,000 to feed the hungry and starving of Russia. Some of you whose statesmanship will not permit you to support this legislation raised no objection when Congress doled out an appropriation to feed the hungry people of Germany not many years ago.

There was no objection from some of the same Members to the appropriations, and there was no cry about "the dole" whenever Congress decided to feed the destitute of other lands. It has only been a few years since the gentleman who occupies the White House and who now warns Congress against making any direct appropriation for relief for the starving people of America did ask Congress for a dole of $100,000,000, as I recall, to the starving children of Belgium, and the appropriation was made without opposition or question on either side of this aisle, just as Congress should have done. But I submit in all fairness, Mr. Chairman, that the starving women and children and the destitute people of our own beloved America are entitled to as much consideration as are those of Belgium, Russia, China, or other ungrateful nations beyond the seas.

Inasmuch as that word "dole" seems to be about the only obstacle in the way of some to support this bill, I can not resist the temptation to remind Members of this House once more that this Congress gave a dole of over $250,000,000 in interest when it passed the President's pet measure, the moratorium on certain foreign war debts. Again let me ask, what else but a dole to big business was another pet bill of the White House, with a high-sounding name—the Reconstruction Finance Corporation? With the Federal Treasury in the "red" some $2,000,000,000, Congress has thus far dished out doles to foreign governments, big railroad lines, and international bankers; but let us be candid about the matter—just what has this Congress done thus far to relieve the distressed farmer or the unemployed and destitute of the land? If it is statesmanship to give big business a dole, I insist that it is no crime to feed the hungry, dole or no dole. [Applause.]

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DE PRIEST].

Mr. DE PRIEST. Mr. Chairman, the great State of Illinois passed a bill quite recently, appropriating $18,000,000 for the benefit of the unemployed. Prior to that time the citizens of Chicago, for the purpose of feeding the poor, raised $10,000,000. All of that has been insufficient to feed the hungry people there. I think I am perfectly safe in saying that 10,000 people are walking the streets hungry in my district. This is the first time during this session of Congress we have had an opportunity to help those who can not help themselves. We have appropriated money for several other propositions, such as the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the inflated currency, and so on, and that is what we should have done, but we have never yet provided any money during this session to directly help feed the poor people. I would not care even if it were a dole system, and I am against all doles, but I think that during these perilous times when people are hungry that we ought to cut out all red tape and feed the people of America that will have to defend America when we have occasion to call on them.

There are over 250,000 people in my city out of work. I congratulate the committee which brought in this resolution. I had hoped it would be in sooner. Let us feed the poor people. I know of no better way than to help support the people of America who support America. Some people talk about taxes. Certainly we will pay taxes, and we will pay more taxes, but if the people of America ever get to the point where they are hungry to the extent that they will get violent, it will cost us a great deal more than it will to feed them now.

I am in favor of this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. CLAGUE].

Mr. CLAGUE. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I am greatly pleased that the Committee on Agriculture has recommended this wheat resolution for passage. When I appeared before the Committee on Agriculture a few days ago the resolution only provided for the turning over of 5,000,000 bushels of the Farm Board wheat to the American Red Cross. I advocated before the committee that a much larger amount should be provided for in the resolution, and the committee is entitled to praise in raising the amount to 40,000,000 bushels.

At this time I want to say a few words in behalf of the Red Cross. Prior to a year ago I heard a number of Members of Congress and many people throughout the country say, "I do not want to give to the Red Cross as I am satisfied that much given to them will be wasted." At the last session of Congress a large amount of money was provided to assist the drought-stricken people, particularly in the Southern States. During the month of March, 1931, I made a personal trip through several of the Southern States to get first-hand information regarding the work done by the Red Cross. I made a personal inspection of the work done in Arkansas. My visit took me through some of the sections of that State that were particularly hard hit by the drought, and I had the privilege of seeing much of the work that was done by the Red Cross units. Mr. Evans, who was in charge of the American Red Cross work in Arkansas and Oklahoma, was very kind to me and extended every courtesy in showing us what had been done by their great organization, and turned over to us for our use in visiting some of the drought-stricken sections one of his men and a car. We made a personal visit through some of the worst sections of the State. We were in England, the district represented in Congress by Mr. GLOVER. We talked with many people, both white and black, the rich, and the poor.

I dare say that we talked with more than a thousand different people regarding the work of the Red Cross, and with only two exceptions everybody spoke in the highest terms of the work done by the Red Cross organization. I met business men who told me that they were opposed to the Red Cross workers when they first visited their section, but now they had only good words for what had been done. The colored people with whom we talked stated that they had not in any way been discriminated against and were given exactly the same aid as the white people. The sentiment everywhere throughout the districts we visited was only words of praise for the good work done by the American Red Cross. [Applause.]

Congressman KVALE and I spent a day going through that section of the country with Mr. Wahl, a nephew of Senator ROBINSON. We visited a number of schools. We ate the Red Cross meals furnished to the children. We saw the wonderful work done by this organization in many different sections.

At this time I wish to say to you Members of Congress that Mr. Payne, who has so ably handled the Red Cross work in the United States, is entitled to great praise for the work that he has done and the able manner in which he has handled relief situations. This organization is entitled to your respect and the respect of all the people of this country. I am especially glad at this time that the Members of this House are practically unanimous for this resolution to turn 40,000,000 bushels of wheat over to the Red Cross to be used for relief purposes. [Applause.]

A small portion of the district which I represent, adjoining the State of South Dakota, was severely affected by drought during the past season, and some relief has been given and more is needed. The State of South Dakota was particularly hard hit by drought and grasshoppers last summer. Many of the people are in need of food. Much feed is needed for livestock.

The people in my district have been very liberal in giving aid. One county in my district has contributed more than 20 carloads of food products to South Dakota, valued at about $9,000. The railroads have hauled these cars free of charge to the sections where needed.

The Farm Board has over 150,000,000 bushels of grain in storage, and I am in favor of turning over every bushel that is necessary to take care of the people who are in want, and also to feed livestock that is now starving. I hope this resolution will pass without a dissenting vote. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

All time has expired. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Federal Farm Board is authorized and directed to take such action as may be necessary to make available, from time to time, to the American National Red Cross, or any other organization designated by the American National Red Cross, wheat of the Grain Stabilization Corporation, for use in providing food for the needy and distressed people of the United States and Territories, and for feed for livestock. Such wheat shall be delivered upon any such application only upon the approval of the President of the United States, and in such amounts to each organization as the President may approve, except that the total amount of wheat delivered as hereinbefore authorized shall not be in excess of 40,000,000 bushels.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Committee amendment offered by Mr. JONES: On page 2, line 21, after the word "stock," insert "in the 1931 crop-failure areas."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I wish to state in this connection that it was the thought of the committee that the main portion of this wheat should be used in feeding the hungry people. There were some drought areas in certain localities of America where there was an utter crop failure last year and some of the stock died; some of it was being shot because they could not care for it. It was estimated that not to exceed 5,000,000 bushels would take care of the situation. Perhaps it would not require that much. The committee thought it wise not to put it in a straitjacket, but to leave that to the discretion of the American National Red Cross. It is expected that probably 35,000,000 bushels of this wheat, if necessary, shall go to the feeding of the hungry and distressed people of the United States, both in the cities and anywhere in the country where distress may be found.

Mr. KETCHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. KETCHAM. The full import of the amendment would be to limit the application of the wheat to the livestock only in a few isolated communities?

Mr. JONES. There are only a few States and only small portions of those States. In other words, the application, in so far as that is concerned, would be limited to those small areas; but, so far as feeding the hungry people is concerned, the language of the bill is as broad as the United States.

Mr. KETCHAM. It takes in the cities as well as the open country?

Mr. JONES. The gentleman is right.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. This only refers to the feeding of livestock in certain territory in that particular area, and does not refer to the rest of the paragraph.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman is correct. Those who reported to us from that part of the country say that it will probably not take in excess of 5,000,000 bushels, and possibly not that much.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman propose to place any limitation of time on the other features of this bill; that is, as to when it shall be operative? The gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], in his address to-day, directed attention to the advisability of having the time limited as to when this act should be operative. Under the present wording of the act it would continue for all time.

Mr. JONES. I can see no objection to a reasonable time limit on it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I thought the gentleman had some amendment prepared.

Mr. JONES. No; I have not.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. May I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that his amendment to this clause will not be clear. It is not at all certain that the amendment qualifies "livestock" only.

Mr. JONES. We gave some attention to that.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. May I suggest to the gentleman that we have here the clause "the United States and Territories." Now, properly speaking, a further geographical limitation should follow that clause, "and in these areas," so on, "for livestock."

Mr. JONES. It seems to me that is properly set off by punctuation; that this wheat is available "for use in providing food for the needy and distressed people of the United States and Territories, and for feed for livestock in the 1931 crop-failure areas." The livestock feeding would be limited to the 1931 crop-failure areas, but feeding people would not be so limited. If there is any doubt about it, I would not object to having it perfected.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. It ought to be made absolutely clear.

Mr. JONES. I think it is, but if anyone disagrees with me——

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I disagree. The punctuation is not properly a part of the legislation. We ought not to leave the meaning of this clause to a comma. We ought to put the meaning into the words.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I will ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment and insert the following language: In line 20, after the word "and" insert "in the 1931 crop-failure areas."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment and offer an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES: Page 2, line 20, after the word "and," insert "in the 1931 crop failure areas."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, it occurs to me that the gentleman's first amendment is in very much better language; it reads better, and there can not be any question as to the construction of it in view of the comma after the word "Territories."

Mr. STAFFORD. I think the grammarians of the House agree that the first proposal is better than the last one.

Mr. JONES. That was the view of the committee, but I thought if it would make it better I would put it the other way.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I object to the transposition of the amendment.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I dislike very much to oppose an amendment offered by the chairman of my committee, but I feel there should be no restriction placed on the distribution of this wheat either amongst human beings or amongst livestock.

You will find sections in the United States where there were no crop failures last year; but where the people, on account of the fact that they have no funds and can not borrow money, are not able to buy food for their family cow or for such other livestock as they may have on the farm, and such people are entitled to receive the same consideration as those in other sections of the country.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDRESEN. I will.

Mr. JONES. I will state that this amendment, as the gentleman knows, was suggested by the organization that is designated here, their attitude being if this were left wide open there might be a great many efforts to have general distribution for feeding livestock. This is out of the range of the usual operations of the Red Cross. They have only been handling it in certain areas because of the great emergency. They usually take care of the family cow under the designation of taking care of people. But the main purpose of this measure, in so far as the country generally is concerned, is to see that this excess wheat is used to feed hungry people.

Mr. ANDRESEN. But we have the family cow, the family horse, the family hog, and family chickens all over the United States, and all these as well as the people should be taken care of and a general distribution should be made.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman from Texas yield for a question?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Would the gentleman be willing, in line 15, to strike out "from time to time" and insert "at any time prior to May 1, 1933," which would be more than one year?

Mr. JONES. If that amendment is agreeable to the gentlemen over there, I think it would be all right.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma: On page 3, line 2, after the word "of," strike out "forty" and insert "fifty."

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of my amendment is not difficult to understand. I simply propose to try to dispose of an extra 10,000,000 bushels of wheat now held by the Federal Farm Board that for months has been hanging like a black cloud over the market and also to make sure that the Red Cross will have sufficient wheat to care for the destitute of the country.

I have listened all the afternoon to speeches of gentlemen who have told us of distressed conditions in their States. I have seen the many photographs showing the dead and starving horses, cattle, hogs, and sheep in several Northwestern States. Frankly, I have been amazed to know the dire distress in this country. If conditions are as deplorable as we are told, which I do not doubt, I am fearful that the 40,000,000 bushels of wheat as provided in this bill to be turned over to the Red Cross for distribution will not be sufficient.

Let me add that I attended some of the hearings of the committee and listened to witnesses who appeared. It is no secret that there was and is a wide range of difference of opinion as to the number of bushels of wheat that actually will be necessary to carry out the purposes of this legislation. I do not hesitate to say that if I had my way about it I would make it 80,000,000 bushels or more instead of 50,000,000 as proposed in the pending amendment. I have every reason to believe that the Red Cross could use 80,000,000 or 100,000,000 bushels of wheat for the destitute of this country to a very good advantage.

Now let me call the attention of the committee to the wording of the bill. If you will turn to page 3, line 2, you will see that it reads "of wheat delivered as hereinbefore authorized shall not be in excess of 40,000,000 bushels."

All of you are familiar with the manner in which that great organization, the Red Cross, functions. All of you know that not one bushel will be distributed by the Red Cross in excess of what is actually needed. I am simply proposing in my amendment to say to the Red Cross that Congress is willing to pledge an extra 10,000,000 bushels of wheat, making 50,000,000 in all, if that great organization that has done so much to relieve suffering in every State and Nation needs it. All of us know that not one extra bushel will be used unless it is actually needed.

Of course, it is only a guess as to what is or will be needed. Some who have given the subject much thoughtful consideration insist that 50,000,000 bushels of wheat will not begin to relieve the situation; others insist that the Red Cross will not use the 40,000,000 bushels as is provided in this bill. So I submit that Congress would not only do the proper thing but the safe and practical thing by adopting my amendment to insert the word "fifty" instead of "forty," in order to relieve the distressed situation among the unfortunate people of this land, and incidentally, of course, to feed the starving livestock in drought-stricken areas.

Mr. SPARKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I yield with pleasure to the gentleman.

Mr. SPARKS. Does not the gentleman think it would be a good thing to give all the wheat the Federal Farm Board has to the destitute and unemployed in this country?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I will say to the gentleman that I would gladly use it all. I so stated on this floor this afternoon. I would go farther than take all the surplus wheat and feed it to the hungry. If necessary to dispose of the 157,000,000 bushels of wheat, or whatever the amount may be, now held by the Federal Farm Board, and that hangs like a pall over the wheat market, I would dump it in the ocean. I would rather see it sent to the bottom of the sea than held in warehouses, where, as I stated a few moments ago, it is costing some 18 cents per bushel and seriously hurting the wheat market. But that is not necessary. We have evidence of want and starvation in many quarters; destitute people begging for bread now; and here we have 150,000,000 to 200,000,000 bushels of wheat—no one seems to know how much; Congress does not know, and no one speaking for the Farm Board appears to know—but, whatever the board has, it threatens to sell, and rumors are afloat here frequently that the Farm Board is going to turn loose 50,000,000 to 100,000,000 bushels of wheat, and down goes the price. Let us get rid of as much of this surplus wheat as possible. It will help rather than hurt the market and bring relief to the destitute throughout the entire country. [Applause.]

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma.

In the first place, I am sure the committee will be very glad to learn something of the opinion of the man who, I believe, has a closer view of this situation than any other man in the country. I refer to John Barton Payne, the distinguished head of the Red Cross. Our committee questioned him very closely as to the amount of wheat he thought might possibly be used in connection with this proposal, and at no time did he indicate that anywhere near the total amount already provided in the resolution would be required.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHAM. I will be pleased to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. May I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the "40,000,000 bushels" is merely a high limit or the maximum, and so would be the 50,000,000. It does not necessarily imply that all of it must be distributed, and, manifestly, no more will be used than they find necessary. We are merely giving an authorization for 50,000,000 and not requiring that that amount shall be distributed.

Mr. KETCHAM. Furthermore, may I say, Mr. Chairman, that just a moment ago my understanding is the committee agreed to an amendment limiting the operation of the bill to May 1, 1933. While the amendment has not been offered, my understanding is it is agreeable, and if such an amendment is adopted, of course, the operation will not extend beyond that period, and by no possible means would they be able to come anywhere near using the amount already provided as the limit in the bill.

An additional reason why it seems to me we ought not to accept the amendment is this. In this whole matter time is the very essence of the thing. Every Representative from South Dakota said that everything should be done to expedite this matter, and it is believed that with the bill in the shape it is at the present time, there will be no difficulty about reaching an agreement with the Senate and making it operative so that the actual distribution of wheat may begin from Omaha within the next week. Therefore on behalf of the people who made the appeal that I think was the moving factor in securing favorable action in the matter, I sincerely hope nothing will be done to retard the giving of relief at the earliest possible moment or getting the wheat out where it is needed in the shortest possible time, and I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma) there were 26 ayes and 73 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, lines 15 and 16, strike out the words "from time to time" and insert in lieu thereof the words "at any time prior to May 1, 1933."

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the amendment: In the last line of the amendment strike out the date "May 1, 1933" and insert in lieu thereof "July 1, 1932."

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, this amendment has come up so suddenly that I have not thought it out thoroughly. The amendment offered by the gentleman from New York does require some little thought and should among other matters be considered as to what effect it may have upon the market situation.

All of the similar bills that have been offered here proposing to turn Farm Board wheat over to the Red Cross or other agencies for charitable purposes have been based on the assumption, if I understand it correctly, that the wheat should be turned over promptly and used particularly during this winter season when the need is the greatest, or at least not later than during the spring. Now is the time when the people are in need, when help is most urgent.

I do not want to see an amendment adopted which will give the Red Cross or anyone else an opportunity to argue, "Well, Congress proposes the use of 40,000,000 bushels of wheat during the next 15 months," and encourage them to go out in March, April, and May of this year and distribute only approximately one-fifteenth of the total amount authorized in the bill. I feel that danger lurks in the small amendment where the specific date of May 1, 1933, is set.

Therefore, it seems to me that if we are going to write any congressional time limit into the law, if we are not willing to leave it entirely to the discretion of the Red Cross and the President of the United States, if we insist on putting in a time limit, we ought to provide a limit which is not likely to misconstrue our intention, but one which shows that it is the intention of Congress that they shall proceed to use the wheat at once to take care of the present deplorable situation.

I, for one, in spite of my desire to help out the needy all over the country, must also consider the bill's effect upon the wheat producer and consider whether under its terms there might be a distribution of wheat that would interfere with their interests in the next marketing season.

We are in a desperate situation in the wheat sections of this country. The market price of wheat is less than one-half of the cost of production. A most delicate time affecting the market price is a month or so before the crop matures as well as during the time most of the new crop is marketed. I think there is a serious question whether the wheat that is to be distributed under this law ought not to be distributed prior to July 1. It is hoped that the conditions will not be so serious by that time. At least the livestock during the summer will not normally be in great need. Employment will probably be available to a much greater degree than now. Would it not be better to distribute the authorized amount as quickly as possible now when great need exists and then take care of future situations later? I fear that if we adopt the limitation proposed it will imply that distribution can take place throughout all the next marketing season. In that event I think the bad effects on the wheat markets of this country might offset the good otherwise accomplished by this measure. When I say that I refer not only to the welfare of the individual wheat farmer who will have wheat to sell but also to the welfare of the industrial worker in the city, who wants a job, and who, in order to get a job, must have the rehabilitation of the purchasing power of the agriculture of this country, of which the wheat producer is an important part.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTNESS. Yes.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. In this bill there is a proviso that all of this shall be handled in an orderly manner, with the approval of the President of the United States. Does the gentleman believe that under any condition or stretch of imagination if the President did not believe it was helpful to the situation he would handle it in any other way?

Mr. BURTNESS. Personally, I have not asked for any limitation. I am willing to leave it entirely to the discretion of the President, because you have the limitation as to amount, which is the important limitation, but if a date is to be inserted, I think the one suggested is dangerous, in that it may be construed as a congressional mandate to spread the relief over 15 months, rather than to take care of the present needs immediately.

In any event, distribution should not be made in such a way as to adversely affect the price in the market when the new 1932 crop is ready for harvest or sale.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, I am surprised at the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURTNESS]. He comes from a northern country where they can not produce food necessary to take care of their people at this time. We have pictures in the committee showing snow on the ground. The gentleman proposes to limit this to July 1, 1932, when his section of the country could not possibly produce enough crops to relieve this condition in that time. The amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] is a proper amendment, and I shall support it. I think the amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from North Dakota should be defeated.

Mr. McGUGIN. What is the occasion for either of these amendments?

Mr. GLOVER. The gentleman may determine that for himself.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman from Kansas. I do not know that either one of these amendments is necessary. I do not believe the amendment of the gentleman from North Dakota is at all necessary. No one can guarantee when this depression is going to end, whether in six months or two years from now. I think it would be better to vote both the amendments down. As far as the amendment of the gentleman from North Dakota is concerned, this bill provides for sufficient wheat to feed 10,000,000 people for six months——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Feed them on what?

Mr. FISH. On bread.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. You can not feed the American people on bread alone. They are not Chinese coolies.

Mr. FISH. That is all this bill provides for. I think the amendment of the gentleman from North Dakota should be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Dakota.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LUDLOW: Page 2, line 16, after the word "Cross," insert "the Salvation Army," and in the beginning of line 17, strike out the word "other."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane. The resolution designates one organization, and it is not in order to designate an additional organization.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. LUDLOW. I do not care to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out line 2 on page 3.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARSONS. I am glad indeed to know that the great humanitarian spirit has returned to the Chief Magistrate in the White House. I am also glad to note that that great nation-wide organization, the American Red Cross, has seen fit to take into its folds the relief of the distressed of this country, which it rejected one year ago. I came into this House as a new Member in December, 1930. Bills of a similar nature had been introduced and were in the committee at that time, but no hearings were held upon them. Every time the matter was mentioned, even in the debate upon the loans that were to be made to the agricultural sections because of the drought, we heard the great cry on the Republican side and in some sections on the Democratic side of a dole. I remember when one of the gentlemen from Arkansas stood here in this spot and told of the drought conditions that prevailed then in the State of Arkansas, where hundreds and thousands of children were starving, barefooted, and without shelter. They refused to vote relief under those conditions or to consider the matter on the same basis that we are considering this to-day. It is not fair for this to pass to the country unnoticed. While there is more unemployment in the Nation, there is not the widespread misery, destitution, and want on as large a scale to-day as there were in 1930, when similar measures were before the Congress.

At that time the President said we were playing politics with human misery. When did he and others change their position? It can not be denied that many who are supporting this measure of relief to-day, including the President, have reversed their positions on the principle involved since last year. If it was playing politics with human misery then, what say ye now about playing politics in the election year of 1932? I leave it to the sane judgment of the House and the country as to who is playing politics now with human misery. I want to observe again that the humanitarian spirit has returned not only to the Chief Magistrate of the Nation, not only to the American Red Cross but to many of the gentlemen on that side of the aisle who fought it last year. I am glad they have repented and become converted to the principles of justice in feeding starving Americans as well as those across the sea.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I have sent to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CONNERY: On page 2, line 17, after the word "designated," strike out the words "by the American National Red," and in line 18, strike out the word "Cross" and insert in lieu thereof the words "by the President of the United States."

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I have nothing against the Red Cross at all, but I prefer to leave my case to the President of the United States. In the large cities where this relief must be distributed, if friction comes up in reference to who will distribute this relief, I prefer to bring my case to President Hoover than to be told by the Red Cross, "It is none of your business; we have full authority and we are not going to give it to the Jewish organizations or to the Salvation Army, or to the Catholic charities, or anybody else. We will do as we please."

In these community chests which we have in Washington, and which we have in all the large cities of the country, there is perfect unity among all these organizations which I have mentioned and which have been mentioned by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA]. I feel sure that if this amendment is adopted, they will understand that it is the sense of the House that we can go to the President and tell him how we want it distributed in our large cities.

That is my sole reason for offering the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DEROUEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I have sent to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DEROUEN: Page 2, line 18, after the word "corporation," insert "and not to exceed 2,000,000 bushels of rice grown in the United States, upon which the Federal Farm Board has effected loans."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not in order, not being germane.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Louisiana desire to be heard?

Mr. DEROUEN. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BLAND.) The point of order is sustained.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words simply to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to what appears to me to be an imperfection of the language.

I call attention to the language in lines 21 and 22, page 2:

Such wheat shall be delivered upon any such application only upon the approval of the President of the United States.

The preceding language does not say anything at all about any application. If it is the intention that this shall be upon the application of the Red Cross or some other organization, I suggest an amendment in line 16 to strike out the word "to" and insert the words "on application by." You will then have an antecedent for the word "application" in line 22. Otherwise the words "such application" do not seem to refer to anything at all.

Mr. JONES. I think it would be inferred, but I believe the language which the gentleman suggests clarifies the matter.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, then I offer an amendment to that effect.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOCH: On page 2, line 16, strike out the word "to" and insert the words "on application by."

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I think the gentleman has overlooked the fact that if that change is made this wheat will be subject to application not only by the American National Red Cross but also by any other organization designated by them. I do not think that is what the gentleman intends, but rather that it may be delivered to any organization designated by the Red Cross. He wants the application itself to be by the Red Cross, does he not?

Mr. HOCH. Well, what does the committee intend? The bill reads "such application."

Mr. JONES. That is what the intention was, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. LEAVITT. As I understand the intention of the committee, it was that it should be given to the Red Cross or anyone that they designated.

Mr. JONES. That is what it will do in this instance. They would have to designate some organization before they could apply for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOCH].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

This is a splendid measure, but it does not go far enough. Our people want to feed the hungry, but we also want to dispose of the Federal Farm Board. We would like to see something done that would drop the Federal Farm Board and all connected with it into some great body of water and leave it there. The grain industry is calling for that. The livestock industry is calling for that, and 90 per cent of the agriculturists in Missouri are calling for it. We want real relief from the Farm Board as well as relief for the hungry people in the districts that are affected.

One gentleman from New York said that this was a measure intended to protect the Government, to keep the wheat in the warehouses from rotting. Then another gentleman said this was a great humanitarian measure to help those who were hungry. Then I heard another Member praise the Red Cross.

The Red Cross has taken two positions on this dole question. John Barton Payne announced during a former Congress that he would not accept American dollars for distribution when authorized by Congress. This was after a consultation with the Executive. Now he comes along and says that the Red Cross will distribute this commodity. There is apparently a vast difference in his mind between the thing that stands for the dollar—namely, a commodity—and the dollar itself. Or perhaps he has seen the Executive again, and it may be that the Executive has changed his mind. But be that as it may, I think that the wild haste that was shown by this administration in serving the bankers, the railroads, and Europe was in direct contrast with the effort to serve suffering man. We have been in session for almost 90 days, and some have the hardihood to stand up and say that the administration was not cognizant of individual distress until a few days ago. To me this is a gross maligning of the administration; or, if it is true, the administration is grossly ignorant of conditions in this country. The first beneficiary under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act was a gentleman named "Mr. Wabash"; I do not know his first name, but he went away with $7,000,000. I am going to learn his name by and by, when they give us the secret list of those they have helped, if they ever do.

Then I want to say to you I am not sure the President is with you in this. I want to read into the RECORD at this time from the message of the President read to the House on December 8:

> I am opposed to any direct or indirect Government dole. The breakdown and increased unemployment in Europe is due in part to such practices. Our people are providing against distress from unemployment in true American fashion by a magnificent response to public appeal and by action of the local governments.

I say to you who follow this man that if he meant what he said in his message, then he has either changed his mind concerning aid to human beings, or you are driving him into a barbed-wire entanglement by voting this dole. Well might it be asked when is a dole not a dole?

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHANNON. Yes.

Mr. McGUGIN. Being a good disciple of Thomas Jefferson, does not the gentleman prefer local self-government rather than centralized government?

Mr. SHANNON. Yes; when local self-government really exists and is not centralized, as it is now; and where the wealth of the country is properly distributed and not, as it is now, centralized in a few sections; but there is no wealth in the part of the country that needs this assistance at this time.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. That is the reason they need it.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I rise at this time in order to question the chairman of the committee. I would like to have my mind cleared up on a couple of things. Last year, when the Red Cross was distributing relief throughout the country and it was suggested they feed the children of starving miners in Pennsylvania, they said that was not an emergency. The head of the Red Cross said they did not intend to feed those children. When they came before the committee on these hearings did the committee see fit to take care of a matter of that sort in this legislation? I notice this bill provides that it shall be subject to the approval of the President, and it gives the Red Cross absolute carte blanche authority as to whom they shall give this food. So I ask the gentleman whether the Red Cross is going to neglect to feed the children of starving miners, whether they are in Pennsylvania or in Harlan County, Ky. If the chairman thinks there might be such a thing as that, I would vote against such a bill.

Mr. JONES. I will say that wise men sometimes change their minds. I have no doubt the American National Red Cross will take care of emergency cases wherever they may find them or arrange with other organizations in the larger cities to do so.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the chairman of the committee say that it is the intention of Congress in providing this wheat that it shall be distributed wherever it is needed, including the mining districts in Kentucky and Pennsylvania and other parts of the country?

Mr. JONES. I certainly shall, and I think that was the purpose of the committee. I think I voice the sentiment of the committee in making that statement; that is, that there shall be no discrimination. Of course, the organization may not be able to care for all worthy cases, but I am sure they will do the best they can with a big job.

Mr. CONNERY. I want the House to know it is my desire that the Red Cross should be informed by this debate on the floor of the House that is the intention of Congress. I do not intend that any child or anyone suffering in the United States should be discriminated against in giving the aid we are providing to-day. [Applause.]

Mr. ALLGOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I will yield.

Mr. ALLGOOD. I want to ask the chairman of the committee whether he would be willing to agree to an amendment that I have prepared. I have prepared an amendment to the effect that at least 10,000,000 bushels of wheat shall be distributed in the rural sections.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, it involves a good deal of difficulty to administer a proposition of this kind throughout a country as large as this. I do not like to have the organization hamstrung by rules and restrictions. I do not know of any organization you can come nearer trusting on a proposition of this kind than the American National Red Cross, and I would rather leave them free to administer to the hungry wherever they find them anywhere under the flag. [Applause.]

Mr. ALLGOOD. Then it is understood that it is to be used in the country districts where it is needed?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. PARKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. PARKS. I just want to say this, in view of what has been said about the Red Cross: I can not understand why anybody should have any doubt about the Red Cross administering this aid equitably and justly in view of what was done last year throughout the United States, where millions of people were fed by the Red Cross without one single just complaint that I have ever heard. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNERY. But the gentleman evidently did not hear me when I said they refused to feed starving babies in the mining districts of Pennsylvania.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

> SEC. 2. No part of the expenses incident to the delivery, receipt, and distribution of such wheat shall be borne by the United States or the Federal Farm Board. Such wheat may be milled or exchanged for flour or feed, but if processed it shall be without profit to any mill, organization, or other person.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Mr. HUDDLESTON: On page 3, line 3, after "Sec. 2." strike out "No part of," and after the words "United States" on page 3, line 5, strike out the words "or the Federal Farm Board."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment on the ground it would involve an appropriation. This committee has not authority to report an appropriation and therefore the amendment is out of order.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard, if the Chair has any doubt about it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The test of an appropriation is whether, under it, an officer of the Treasury may make an outlay of public funds or whether further congressional action is required before that action can be taken. This is the test. Under this test it is very clear that this amendment does not involve an appropriation. It merely authorizes an appropriation.

A distinction must be made between creating an obligation of the Government and appropriating the funds in the Treasury for the payment of an obligation. Measures which merely create a governmental obligation are not appropriations and are not subject to the rule. This amendment merely creates an obligation. It does not authorize an expenditure of public funds and, very clearly, is not a violation of the rules.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas desire to be heard?

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the words "expenses incident to the delivery, receipt, and distribution of such wheat shall be borne by the United States" makes a very clear obligation to pay out money. It is a simple statement involving an appropriation and the expenditure of money which is not involved in this bill anywhere and, besides, this committee has not authority to make an appropriation.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the Chair hear me a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I shall support the amendment proposed by my colleague from Alabama, but on the question of parliamentary construction it appears to me that the amendment is in order. It merely seeks to strike out——

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order in order to save time.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn; and the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to have this wheat distributed at the expense of the Government of the United States. As the bill now stands, this expense is imposed upon the charitable organizations throughout the country that may be in contact with those who are in need. As the bill now stands, it requires the community chests, the relief organizations, the Red Cross, and whatever other charitable organizations there may be throughout the country to take some of the money which they have collected from the people for the relief of distress and use it for paying the freight and other expenses of distributing this wheat.

In logic, if we are going to give the starving thousands some food, we should give it to them without tying a string to it. [Applause.] Why say to them, "You must pay the expense of getting this wheat to you"?

Is this a real relief measure? Is it for the relief of those who are in distress or is it for the relief of the Farm Board? Is this for farm relief or is this a destitution measure? Is this a means whereby food will be gotten to those who are starving or is it merely a means whereby some wheat may be gotten off the hands of the Farm Board so as to relieve the wheat-price situation?

Candor, good faith, straight dealing require that if we pretend to give the suffering people something we should give it to them without any string to it. If, on the other hand, our real purpose is simply to relieve the wheat market, then let us do like one of the gentlemen has said—take this wheat out and dump it in the ocean. Congress as the representative of the Government should be honest with the people when it says that our purpose is to relieve them. Congress should not, under the subterfuge of relieving the starving, undertake to relieve the wheat market and lay a charge for the expense of distribution upon the charitable organizations throughout the country. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman is unduly exercised. As a matter of fact, the testimony before the committee shows that practically all this work of processing is done without charge by the local organizations. Of course the Red Cross will probably not be able to handle such a large undertaking without expense, but they can probably do so at less cost than would be incurred in most any other way.

The American National Red Cross is a great organization and it has been able to even get the transportation, in most instances, without charge, or with little cost. Under the general terms of this bill the by-products will no doubt be sufficient to cover transportation and other items. It has been able to get the processing without charge, and it has been able to get most of the work done without any expense, and I think there is no particular necessity for adopting any such amendment.

Mr. KETCHAM. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. KETCHAM. Has not the gentleman overlooked the fact that if the motion of the gentleman prevails an appropriation would be required and that, of course, takes away one of the most important elements, namely, the necessity for speed.

Mr. JONES. That would delay the proposition, and so far as dumping it in the ocean, as the gentleman suggests, I do not think any man who has any charitable instinct in his heart wants to dump this wheat into the ocean when there are so many hungry people in the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HUDDLESTON) there were 22 ayes and 89 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 8, add the following: "In cities of over 25,000 population the American National Red Cross, or any organization designated by it, may have said flour obtained in accordance with section 2 baked into bread or processed into food for distribution: Provided, That no part of the expense incident to such baking or processing shall be paid out of said wheat or flour, and no part of said expense shall be borne by the United States or the Federal Farm Board."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I have offered this amendment to make clear that the distribution in cities shall not be limited to flour, because flour would be useless in the large cities; the baking at home would cost as much as the bread, because the fuel is so expensive.

The reason I do not provide for paying for the baking or the processing of the wheat and flour is because I do not want in any way to disturb the normal consumption of flour in the cities.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, the committee has considered the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York and has no objection to it.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman from New York tell us how this expense is to be borne?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Take New York City, for example. We have charity organizations who will take care of it.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I notice in the report that the Red Cross is not a completed organization in New York City. Has the gentleman any idea what organizations in the city would handle this?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; I believe the Red Cross will operate in New York City; then there are other charitable organizations; the Hebrew organizations and the Catholic organizations, and I think the Salvation Army is in it, and I think they would handle it.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I hope they will, and I wish the Red Cross would become a complete national organization.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I am surprised at the picture the gentleman paints of the conditions in New York City. I was under the impression that the people maintained homes and baked their own bread.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Oh, the gentleman knows better; there is no use spoofing about New York City. The gentleman knows our people live in tenements and apartment houses, and that they have to consume gas for fuel, and the gas under the Power Trust is so expensive that the people can not bake their bread at home.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in four minutes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman make it six minutes? I want two minutes.

Mr. JONES. I will amend my request and make it six minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman amends his request and asks unanimous consent that all debate on the section and amendments thereto close in six minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition for two minutes to call attention to the fact that the city of Milwaukee in meeting destitute conditions among the artisan class, we are providing food generally to the needy, and a principal part of the allowance is flour. Our people in Milwaukee keep homes, and they have not forgotten the way to make bread. I am rather surprised that the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] takes exception to my inquiry, but apparently he is living in a city where they have lost the art of properly maintaining a home.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, during this debate there has been an underlying sentiment in favor of doing something to help the wheat farmer. I venture to suggest to you a matter that came to me from a valued constituent the other day. That is the statement that if 50 per cent of the American people would eat one slice of bread more at each meal it would mean an increased consumption of wheat of 90,000,000 bushels a year, an increased consumption representing 22,500,000 barrels of flour, 45,000,000 cotton sacks—and I think that means something to our southern friends—22,500,000 pounds of malt extract, 67,500,000 pounds of sugar, 45,000,000 pounds of shortening materials, 67,000,000 pounds of milk solids, and 33,750,000 pounds of yeast made from farm products.

I have taken this time during the debate to-day to call to the attention of the House and to our newspaper friends in the gallery to the aid that can be rendered to a great American industry, wheat farming, by an eat-more-wheat campaign. All the ingredients used in bread making except salt come from the farm. The farmer must have a demand for his products before any of our industries will prosper. The farmer can and will buy the products of the cities if he can get the money. Eating more of the health-giving products of wheat will give the farmer who raises wheat that money, and will give an impetus to railroad tonnage and business all down the line.

Two years ago the Nation put on an "eat-more-butter campaign." It aided materially the butter and dairy industry. Let us now aid the wheat farmer and in turn all growers of grain by encouraging an increased consumption of wheat products. It is eminently worth trying. If it succeeds, it will do much to restore the buying power of the farmer and aid every line of industry. [Applause.]

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, this resolution as it passed the Senate provides for the distribution of 5,000,000 bushels of wheat. As reported by the committee and sustained by the House, it provides for the distribution of 40,000,000 bushels of wheat. I am glad that the Committee on Agriculture has used the Red Cross as the agency for distribution. It has the confidence not only of the people of the United States but of the entire world. However, I can not let this occasion pass without emphasizing the fact that during the last session of Congress, when distress was prevailing in Arkansas and other sections stricken with the drought, the chairman of the Red Cross appeared before a joint committee composed of members of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations on the Interior Department and of the subcommittee having in charge the deficiency appropriation bill and flatly refused to administer the distribution of money if it were appropriated by the Government of the United States and placed in their hands for relief of the drought sufferers in those sections.

I am advised that a similar statement was made before the Committee on Agriculture. I can not see any distinction between using the American Red Cross as an agency to distribute money and in using it as an agency to distribute wheat or other food products. If you appropriate money, wheat and other necessaries for relief are purchased.

This is a bill in behalf of suffering humanity. We have been considering much other legislation during the present session of Congress recommended for the relief of the depression. This bill for the relief of humanity rather balances our legislative diet.

I supported the legislation during the last session of Congress for the relief of sufferers mostly throughout the South. I am not so local or so provincial as to decline to support this bill which for the most part is for the relief of the people of the North and Northwest.

The report of the committee indicates that the most urgent needs are in the States of Montana, North and South Dakota, and Nebraska. The newspaper accounts confirm the facts set forth in the report of the committee. I did not oppose the amendment to have wheat distributed at the expense of the Government of the United States. I am glad to see Members from all sections lay aside local prejudices and support this legislation. Everyone knows that there is distress throughout the entire country and there may be some need for relief in many more localities than were brought to the attention of the committee.

This legislation is for the purpose of relieving distress by feeding the hungry. I believe in local self-government, but when a large number of our people are in distress and when the burden gets too great for any State or locality to bear, the Federal Government should come to the relief of its citizens. I am glad, therefore, to give this bill my support. Surely we must not permit women and children to go hungry when we have a large supply of wheat held by the Grain Stabilization Corporation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. The Federal Farm Board shall keep account of all wheat delivered as authorized in section 1, and shall credit the account of the Grain Stabilization Corporation with an amount equal to the current market value thereof at the time of delivery.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WHITTINGTON: On page 3, line 13, after the period following the word "delivery," insert the following: "There is hereby authorized to be appropriated to reimburse the revolving fund of the Federal Farm Board an amount equal to the current market value of all wheat delivered as authorized in section 1 at the time of delivery."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is not germane to the paragraph nor to the bill.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, section 3 provides that the Federal Farm Board shall keep an account of all wheat delivered as authorized by section 1, and shall credit the account of the Grain Stabilization Corporation with an amount equal to the current market value thereof at the time of delivery. Therefore the bill in this section is dealing with the only funds that are available to the Federal Farm Board, to wit, the revolving fund, which has been appropriated by Congress for the operations of this board. The agricultural marketing act authorizes an appropriation of $500,000,000 as a revolving fund. Congress has appropriated that entire amount. Inasmuch as the undisputed hearings disclose that the Federal Farm Board owns indirectly the wheat involved in this legislation, subject to outstanding primary loans of approximately 32 cents a bushel, it must follow that before the Federal Farm Board can make the wheat available, out of the revolving fund there must be paid approximately, at to-day's market price or at the market price at the time the legislation was reported—a few days ago—approximately 32 cents a bushel. The purpose of my amendment is to maintain the integrity of that fund from which these payments are to be made in order that this legislation may be administered. There will be no authority and there is no authority for a subsequent appropriation by Congress to reimburse the Federal Farm Board for the amounts that they are required to pay in order to settle these outstanding primary loans without this amendment.

I submit it is not only germane to the bill but germane to section 3 of the bill, because both the bill and section 3 thereof deal with the funds of the Federal Government and with the revolving fund of the Federal Farm Board. My amendment is to provide for protecting the revolving fund by authorizing the reimbursement of the amounts expended by the board to make the wheat available. I submit it is germane to both the bill and the section.

Mr. JONES. I submit it to the judgment of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment is not germane. The amendment refers to an appropriation. There is nothing in the section dealing with an appropriation. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment, as amended, as a substitute for the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the committee automatically rises.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLAND, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration Senate Joint Resolution 110, and, pursuant to House Resolution 164, reported the Senate joint resolution back to the House with an amendment adopted by the committee.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the Senate joint resolution.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the Senate joint resolution.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 345, nays 2, not voting 84, as follows:

CONSOLIDATED HEARINGS BEFORE WAYS AND MEANS COMMITTEE

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, from the Committee on Printing, I report back favorably, without amendment, a privileged concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 27) relative to the printing of revenue revision, 1932, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina calls up a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the concurrent resolution, as follows:

House Concurrent Resolution 27

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That in accordance with paragraph 3 of section 2 of the printing act approved March 1, 1907, the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives be, and is hereby, empowered to have printed 2,500 additional copies of the consolidated hearings held before the committee during the current session relative to revenue revision, 1932.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 110

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members have five legislative days within which to extend their remarks on the Government-owned wheat bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I am supporting this resolution to donate 40,000,000 bushels of wheat for the starving people of our Nation, and yet I realize it may injure the wheat growers of the Nation. I can not see how it can possibly help the farmers of my section, and yet those of us from the South are supporting it as an emergency measure in behalf of those that are starving. Our Nation furnished millions of dollars worth of wheat and other foodstuffs for starving Russians and peoples of the other war-torn countries of Europe and no one can justify a refusal to do as much for the people of our own Nation.

This is another makeshift measure, which at best is only an emergency move and which many of us must support because we can not get the chance to support a better bill. Why vote wheat and nothing else for the starving peoples of our country? Some of the wheat will be used for feeding livestock, but none of it will be used as food for the poor people of the Nation until some one mills it and some one cooks it. Many of the starving of the large cities have no way to do the cooking, which means that it must be reduced to bread by some bakery before it is handed to the starving bread lines. I know the bill provides that no profit shall be made by anyone milling this wheat or making it into bread. Well, maybe so, but it will be contrary to the policy of the big millers and baking concerns if this is done. I will call attention to another feature of the bill which may cause trouble.

Congress is proposing to deal with this wheat as though it was the property of the Government. It is owned by the stabilization corporations set up under the Farm Board for the purpose of making profits out of the products of the farmers of the country. I objected to these organizations as being detrimental to the farmers rather than being in their interest. But, be that as it may, these corporations brought into existence by Congress now own this wheat subject to such liens as the Farm Board and others may hold against it, and Congress can not by this act divest that corporation of its rights. Congress has simply done the foolish thing of creating this gigantic machine which has rendered no real service to the farmers of the country, which is helpless and hopeless as an agency for good at all times and which has as its chief aim the making of profits out of the farmers in times of distress and in times of prosperity, and which has heretofore and is still making—or at least collecting—for its officials salaries seven and eight times as large as the salaries of Members of Congress. Will we never quit inflicting on our country this kind of bureaucratic government?

This bill may suit the stabilization corporations, if so, all well and good; if not, they can ignore this act of Congress and tell Congress that it is superior to the agency that brought it into existence and that this wheat can be obtained when Congress does as the stabilization corporation chooses, and not before.

The Government created the Federal Farm Board and through that board brought these stabilization corporations into existence over the protest of many of us, and furnished the money to buy this wheat, but now must deal with this organization of high-salaried profit-seeking officials before this wheat can be obtained for the starving millions. This bill can not take this wheat and deal with it as the property of the United States, for it is not.

But enough along this line. Why does not Congress proceed to help the starving peoples of our country by making available the millions of food owned by the farmers of the Nation by buying that food and letting it go to the starving peoples direct from the farms so that no profit will be made by anyone except the producers of the country? Why pass a bill with all kinds of entanglements, with big millers, Baking Trust, and stabilization corporations? The starving peoples can not eat bread alone and feel good about it.

It certainly occurs to me that more real service could be rendered to the starving by the purchase of foodstuffs of the farm and delivery to these people direct without the intervention of the ever-present middleman than can possibly be done under this bill.

But I did not intend to discuss this bill at length. I must again call attention to the fact that Congress has not yet taken up any bill except those providing temporary palliatives. Millions have been voted the corporations as loans, while insignificant amounts are to be grudgingly loaned to the farmers, after every possible unnecessary and unreasonable delay with miles and miles of restrictions and regulations that are a disgrace to the department that promulgated them; but nothing has been done to even start the return of prosperity. Nothing has been done to help the farmer get a better price for his products, to help the laborer get employment and fair pay for his services, or to help the small independent business man get on his feet in a financial way. Nothing has been done to cause the small country bank to reopen where it is now closed or to cause those that are open to do a safe and profitable business as heretofore.

I am wondering what many leading Republicans and Democrats who are sponsoring this do-nothing program will promise the people this summer. They will have to run on promises, if it all, for they certainly can not run on achievements, unless they accomplish more in the future than they have in the past.

Mr. TIERNEY. Mr. Speaker, this measure will afford relief to thousands of the people in need of food in the United States by turning 40,000,000 bushels of Government wheat, all stored, over to the people for food.

I like especially the feature of Congressman LAGUARDIA's amendment which provides that the wheat may not only be turned over to the Red Cross, but that they may be authorized to have the wheat converted into bread, as there is very little home baking these days, especially in the cities and towns, where more people are in need than in the farming districts. People in the farm districts do not need this aid as much as the people in towns.

A very good feature of this situation is that this measure is costing the Government no new tax or appropriation and is a saving of and release of existing tax.

The Government appropriated two years ago $500,000,000 to purchase, and did purchase, 150,000,000 bushels of wheat with the view of stabilizing the wheat and food market. This was a false economic move on the part of the Farm Board and the administration which worked out disastrously for the Government.

We have this wheat at a high figure. If we sell it at the present lowered market price we will ruin the wheat market and injure the farmers. If we hold it we are paying $7,200,000 yearly storage, at 18 cents a bushel; and, strange to say, $2,000,000 of this annually is paid to Canada for storage.

The Government has, as the farmer would say, a "bull by the tail" and can not let go. If it holds the wheat, it costs money and is a continuous menace to trade prices and the market on account of the uncertainty of the Government's attitude. If, on the other hand, it sells, ruin follows.

Some one foolishly suggested a solution will be to take our loss of several hundred millions and dump the wheat in the Atlantic Ocean. I do not know whether this measure will be a greater relief for the poor than it will be for the Farm Board and the present administration in their dilemma.

This is one way of relieving the situation and aiding the poor and needy, through the channels of the Red Cross and no doubt other charitable associations, without costing the Government an appropriation. Every other measure of direct or indirect relief calls for Government expenditures and increase of tax; this calls for no Government taxation, the expense of distribution and the means of distribution to be worked out by and through the Red Cross and no doubt allied charitable and philanthropic organizations.

We have contributed millions of bushels of wheat and millions of dollars to aid the Chinese suffering through the flood. We have also aided likewise the Russians and Belgians, the stricken people throughout the world; everywhere where there is a calamity or earthquake or a like call for help we step in and aid.

At this time it seems we can do no less than to aid our own. Surely the 8,000,000 people out of work in the United States could use bread in sufficient quantity to use up all the wheat we have foolishly stored up and do not know what to do with.

This is a substantial move in the right way toward keeping taxation down and balancing our Budget, as well as relief to the unemployed.

The wheat is here available; let us use it to feed the hungry.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Speaker, this bill is one that I can vote for with more or less pleasure. I believe it is the first time this Congress has gone on record during this session with a real humanitarian measure.

We have millions of bushels of wheat, purchased with the taxpayers' money. We went into the grain business, and the man on the farm did not profit by our activities. Not only did the farmer fail to profit by the purchases—most of which were made by the Farm Board after the wheat left the farmers' hands and at a price greater than was paid to the farmer—but this enormous surplus of wheat has constituted a continuing menace to him and his economic future.

We are told in Holy Writ that certain ancient kings stored up surpluses of grain. They did it in the fat years to prepare for the lean years. We have taken only half of the lesson to heart. We have stored up the grain in years of abundance, but we have not as yet distributed it in this lean year. And I doubt if in those lean years of ancient times poverty and distress stalked through a land with a grimmer footstep and a more baleful glance than they do in our land to-day.

We are giving but 40,000,000 bushels of this wheat. The pity is that we are giving only such a small per cent of our total store when we have eight and one-half million of unemployed. Thirty millions of people affected, who can not look to a gainful occupation to provide them with food.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU], who is noted for his correctness in his statements of facts, has informed us that the Government has on hand 155,000,000 bushels of wheat, which is costing us annually 18 cents per bushel for insurance and storage. In other words, the Government is paying each year for each bushel of wheat nearly one-half as much as the farmers in my district received for their wheat at the elevator; or, on the basis of 155,000,000 bushels at 18 cents per bushel, it is costing the taxpayer $27,900,000 a year to own this wheat. In the interest of economy at a time when all are preaching economy it would seem to me to be the best business in the world to get rid of all of this wheat. The insurance companies and storage men would lose $27,000,000 per year, but I have yet to reach the place where I am willing to believe that this Government is entirely instituted for the purpose of maintaining big business.

We have given two billions to the big industries of the country. We are told by eminent statesmen and financers that was not a dole, but a loan. Now let us grant a loan to the starving. The loans under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act were costly. This act took as an initial payment five hundred millions from the Public Treasury. This distribution of wheat will save the Public Treasury $7,200,000 a year in carrying charges.

Chairman Stone, of the Federal Farm Board, opposes the measure. He also opposes a measure to reduce salaries of officials of his organization—an organization wherein a salary of $75,000 per year is paid an official for representing a class of farmers who, by this official's own testimony, have an annual yearly income of only $300 each.

I am not so sure about the method of distribution. I would like to see some provision in the bill regarding that feature. I would like to see it made certain that there will be no discrimination by the agency that will distribute this wheat. It is an organization with a noble ideal. But not so long ago the head of that organization made statements that, in my opinion, are so far from the universally conceived ideals of the American Red Cross as to have shattered the faith of many people in its leadership. At that time the question was whether starving children of Pennsylvania miners should be fed, and the leader of this great organization of mercy hesitated, stayed the hand of mercy, and held that they should not be. He propounded a new principle, which was that when children starve that their cry for food, their need, should not be the first consideration, but that this great organization that typifies itself on posters as an angel of mercy should first determine that their parents were not engaged in a labor dispute. I should not like to see any such hesitation in the matter of the distribution of this food while children starve.

It is a law of ancient times that "to him who hath shall be given and from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath."

Then came a newer law, the law of human rights, "Whatsoever you would that others should do unto you, do you even also to them," and a divine petition uttered in the hills of Judea, "Give us this day our daily bread."

Let us give the starving their daily bread.

SENATE BILL NO. 1 VERSUS HOUSE BILL NO. 1

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. SCHAFER. Reserving the right to object, on what subject?

Mr. PATMAN. On Senate bill 1 and House bill 1.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, Senate bill No. 1, introduced at the beginning of this session of Congress, has already passed both Houses of Congress, has been signed by the President of the United States, and has become a law. It was a bill to pledge the credit of the United States to the extent of $2,000,000,000 for the purpose of raising money to loan big business. Much of it will be used to pay dividends on watered stocks and bonds. A large part of this money has been paid and will be paid to the house of Morgan, the Mellons, Kuhn, Loeb & Co., and other international bankers. When this bill was before Congress very little was said about the Budget not being balanced or about the deficit in the Treasury. This bill was given the right of way. Big business, so the proponents say, must be taken care of, with the hope that a few crumbs will fall from the rich man's table which can be picked up by the plain people. This money is not intended to pay a debt.

House bill No. 1, introduced at the beginning of this session of Congress, provides that the Government shall pay in cash now a debt that has been acknowledged and confessed to the veterans of the World War for services rendered. It has not been considered by the committee. It will require slightly more, but very little more, than $2,000,000,000 to pay it. If it is paid, the money will go to 3,600,000 veterans of the World War, who reside in every nook and corner of America. It will place purchasing power in the hands of consumers. This bill does not have the backing of the Morgans, Mellons, or the Kuhn-Loebs. It has their opposition. The Government owes this debt; it must be paid some time; if it is paid now, everybody will be helped, the general welfare will be promoted. It can be paid without a bond issue, without additional taxes, and without increasing interest charges.

WHEN WILL H. R. 1 BE CONSIDERED?

The bill has been referred to the Committee on Ways and Means; the committee has made it the next order of business after the present revenue bill is disposed of. It is my information that the revenue bill will probably be disposed of before the end of next week, or March 12.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HOGG of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the postal substitute bill and to include therein a short petition from the Indianapolis Substitute, together with a short editorial from their official paper.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the House of the following title, which was thereupon signed by the Speaker:

GOV. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT ON PUBLIC UTILITIES

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, owing to the fact that this is the 4th of March and that a year from to-day I expect to see the present Governor of the State of New York inaugurated as President of the United States, I think it is very appropriate to insert in the RECORD a part of a message which he delivered to the State Legislature of New York on March 2 concerning public utilities. The New York World-Telegram quotes from this message to the legislature concerning the public service commission of that State and concerning the necessity of bringing about a reduction of rates by public utilities. The fact of the matter is that the cost of public utilities has become one of the costs of the necessities of life in this age of civilization. In this message Governor Roosevelt said:

> It is a startling fact that in spite of the current change in the purchasing power of the dollar there seems to be no voluntary state-wide or nation-wide effort by utility companies to cut their rates proportionately. * * * The public of the State has come to realize that the degree of control and supervision which was hoped for in 1907 has become impossible because of a long line of decisions and judge-made laws which to a great extent have nullified the original purpose of the statute.

He asserted that the commission on revision of public service commission laws had spent a large amount of money, but has produced no legislative action to benefit the people.

It seems to me that there is no subject to-day which is of more vital concern to the American people than the cost of the service rendered by public utilities, especially when those public utilities have issued such large blocks of watered stock, placed them upon the stock market, and the people who have bought the stocks have found them so reduced in value that they are now practically worthless. It is highly important that those who are in charge of the Government, whether it be in State or Nation, and those who are to be in charge of it after next March shall recognize that the public utilities of the country furnish a public necessity of modern civilization and that the regulative bodies which are to regulate those rates shall keep in mind the fact that they are providing a public necessity, and keep in mind also that the rates should be based upon the actual service rendered and the value of the property, regardless of the watered stock that may have been issued.

I have quoted this brief excerpt from the message of Governor Roosevelt as renewed proof of the fact that he is on the side of the people and that he is thinking in terms of the needs of the people in these times when the people are finding it so difficult to meet the costs of the necessities of everyday life.

INVESTIGATION OF COAL-MINING CONDITIONS IN KENTUCKY

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, by way of preface to the introduction of a resolution for an investigation by the Committee on the Judiciary may I say that grave charges of violations of law and of serious interferences with the rights and privileges of citizens of the United States in certain coal-mining regions of Kentucky for some weeks have been receiving general and repeated currency in the press and magazines of the country. Indeed, personal appearances and testimony from well-known and responsible Americans, supplementing petitions for the redress of reported grievances, for some time have come to the attention of various Members of this legislative body.

Without expressing any final decision on the accuracy of these representations, it is just to conclude that probable cause has been shown for public inquiry. In that conviction a resolution on the subject has been prepared by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] and myself. I join in offering it with a definite sense of official responsibility, also with confidence that it tends to serve the public interest, because the coal fields of my own State of Colorado were subjected to a similar and searching inquiry under like circumstances in 1914 by a committee of the National House of Representatives. The Colorado investigation, in which I participated, is credited with ultimate far-reaching and beneficial results, in better industrial and human relations, both State and National. A fair investigation, moreover, may be of special value at this time, since Congress now has before it certain legislative measures designed to regulate and open the way to the efficient and prosperous management of our tragically disorganized, too often antisocial, basic coal-mining industry.

Trusting that the investigation will be authorized and pressed, and requesting a prompt report from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I send the resolution to the desk and ask to have it read.

The resolution (S. Res. 178) was read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to investigate the conditions existing in the coal fields in Harlan and Bell Counties in the Commonwealth of Kentucky with a view to determining particularly (1) whether any system of peonage has been or is being maintained in such coal fields; (2) whether the Postal Service and facilities have been or are being obstructed or interfered with therein, and if so, by whom; (3) whether citizens of the United States have been arrested, tried, or convicted in violation of the Constitution or laws of the United States; (4) whether firearms, ammunitions, or explosives have been shipped into such coal fields from States other than Kentucky, and if so, by whom shipped and by whom paid for; (5) whether any unlawful conditions exist or have existed in such coal fields which interfere or have interfered with the production for interstate shipment, or otherwise with the interstate shipment, of coal from such coal fields; and (6) the causes leading up to the conditions reported to exist in such coal fields. The committee shall report to the Senate as soon as practicable the results of its investigations, together with its recommendations, if any, for necessary remedial legislation.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Senate in the Seventy-second Congress until the final report is submitted; to employ such clerical and other assistants; to require by subpœna or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents; to administer such oaths; to take such testimony; and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

COMMENTS ON THIRD ANNIVERSARY OF INAUGURATION OF PRESIDENT HOOVER

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, this is a very memorable day, the day the newspapers of the morning record as being the third anniversary of the inauguration of President Hoover; and I am going to pause before I proceed, because I am hoping that some Senator on the other side will undertake the task of paying tribute to and giving an accounting of the administration during the last three years. It is natural that it should be done; it is most appropriate that it should be done in this body to-day.

I see sitting before me one of the satellites of the administration, the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS]; I see another distinguished leader over on the Republican side, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], and I suppose, within hearing distance certainly, the distinguished Republican leader, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], can be found. I see also now my fine and good-looking friend, who always rises to the defense of the administration, the distinguished senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM], who has just come into the Chamber. Nor am I going to omit to mention my friend the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who never allows the anniversary of the birthday of Abraham Lincoln to pass without paying tribute to him. If any of these distinguished gentlemen or any other Senator on the Republican side of the Chamber—and there is now a pretty full attendance—desires to rise and exploit the administration and give an accounting of its services I shall yield the floor.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Mississippi yield to me?

Mr. HARRISON. Indeed, I will, and I take my seat. It is most proper that the Senator should be heard.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, yesterday the Senate was edified by a very brilliant speech on the part of the Senator from Mississippi demanding economy and specifying many ways whereby economy could be brought about. Immediately following the consideration of the agricultural appropriation bill was resumed; but before the echo of the sound of the voice of the Senator from Mississippi had died away there were amendments offered greatly adding to the total sum appropriated by the agricultural appropriation bill as it has been reported, although that total approximated $175,000,000. Notwithstanding the Agricultural Department is one of the youngest executive departments of the Government and has not been in existence very long, yet it is growing by leaps and bounds through the increase of its activities. On yesterday, when a roll call was demanded on an amendment proposing an increase of $25,000 in the agricultural appropriation bill, I noticed that almost every Member upon the side of the Chamber for which the Senator from Mississippi speaks, including the Senator from Mississippi himself, voted for the increase. If the utterances of the Senator from Mississippi to-day are to be on a par with his remarks of yesterday, I think no other Senator should interfere with what he may have to say.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, that is all the Senator from Ohio has to say in defense of the administration. [Laughter.] That is his tribute; that is his analysis; that is his accounting. Instead of going on the air in a sealed room with their hot air, reading their eulogies of the President, or doing so in the cloistered rooms of the Republican National Committee, where a humble Democrat like myself can not gain admittance, why does not the Senator from Ohio and why do not other Senators on the Republican side of the Chamber rise on the floor of the Senate to sing their pæans of praise for the administration and try to "sell Hoover" to the country?

The Senator from Ohio heretofore on the anniversary of the inauguration of the President has not thought that it was in the interest of expediency to keep silent. I recall that the first year after the President was inaugurated the Senator from Ohio spoke in praise of the administration for about two hours. It was a very feeble attempt, not characteristic of the distinguished Senator, because he is eloquent in all his addresses and generally enthusiastic in what he has to say; but that day he had a hard job. He realized it. He did it just as well as he could under the circumstances, and he spoke for a long time, giving an accounting of the administration. He gave as his excuse for speaking that day the first anniversary of the Hoover administration.

Then came the second anniversary of the Hoover administration, which seems a long time ago. When I read this morning that this was the third anniversary of the inauguration of President Hoover I just could not realize it. It seems to me it has been an age since Hoover became President of the United States [laughter], and no doubt that is the way it has impressed the country. However, on the second anniversary of the inauguration of the President the Senator from Ohio did not speak upon the floor of the Senate about the achievements of the administration. The praise of the administration was designed to be left to a man named Doubleday, who, as it will be recalled, was the publisher of World's Work, and who had sent out broadcast to all of the beneficiaries of the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill a written letter to be signed by them, and also an appeal to them to make contributions to the cause then represented by Mr. Doubleday, so that sufficient money might be raised to carry in the press all over the country paid advertisements in the form of a letter to be addressed to Mr. Hoover telling him of the fine work he had performed and his high standing among the people of the country. That was the inspiration which caused my friend the Senator from Ohio later to endeavor to "sell Hoover." He took the suggestion from Mr. Doubleday, and so when the Republican National Committee met last year he again tried to "sell Mr. Hoover" to the committee, and neglected to make his usual laudatory speech in this Chamber on the anniversary of Hoover's inauguration.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is the Senator sure the name is Doubleday or Doublecross?

Mr. HARRISON. Probably the latter is the more fitting. When we exploited Mr. Doubleday's efforts here upon the floor of the Senate he backslided and refrained from further participation in the scheme; but that was what furnished the Senator from Ohio the inspiration to try again to "sell Mr. Hoover" to the country.

Now, is it not fair when on this anniversary day we can enter into a real discussion upon this floor of the alleged achievements of the administration that there should be remarks made here rather than that Senators should go into the sealed room of some broadcasting station and send out stuff over the air which ought not to be contaminated by such utterances? For that reason I asked Senators on the other side if they would not take advantage of the opportunity to discuss the achievements of the administration, and I offered to yield to my friend from Ohio, who is still chairman of the Republican National Committee. I think he is still chairman of the committee; there has been so much talk about him retiring from the committee that I do not know whether he is still chairman or not; but, any way, he is, as I believe, the titular chairman of the Republican National Committee. I do not know whether Mr. Burke or some one else is running it; but I thought I was very courteous in offering time to the Senator this morning.

Now, if no Republican Senator will dare to do it, I am going to call the attention of the country to what has been done during the past three years. I want to be fair about it, and if I make any misstatements I want Senators on the other side to rise and correct me, and when I shall have finished I want them to have courage enough to rise here upon the floor and discuss the greatness and the achievements of the present administration. Do not wait to broadcast when no one can answer you.

It will be remembered that the last campaign was known as a whispering campaign; it has now been transformed into a whimpering campaign, and before November next it is going to be a weeping campaign.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I always yield to my friend from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. Is the Senator sure it will not be a "gnashing of teeth" campaign among the Democrats?

Mr. HARRISON. You Republicans look too hungry and too disconsolate for a Democrat now to "gnash his teeth" when he glances at you. No; there will be no "gnashing of teeth" amongst the Democrats. We are in too high hopes and too harmonious in principle to permit the "gnashing of teeth" among ourselves.

I have been amused, Mr. President, at the character of speeches that have been made over the radio by some of the Republican leaders. How their utterances have changed with regard to this remarkable man! I have before me a picture of Mr. Hoover painted by the distinguished Senator from Ohio, a picture I shall never forget. He does not talk that way now, but he did talk that way in 1920. I read from the New York Times of April 1, 1920:

> Representative FESS, of Ohio, chairman of the Republican Congressional Committee—
> He has always been a leader of the Republican Party; he has always been a spokesman for the Republican Party. Of course, there have come times in his remarkable political career when he talked a little bit too much; there have been times when coming from conferences with the President he has talked too much and has received from the President a little slap on the wrist; but it has had little effect upon the distinguished leader of the Republican National Committee—his apparent enthusiasm and loyalty to Republican administrative policies or to any Republican President has always impelled him to rush to their defense. So at this time he said:
> The Republican Party can not accept an internationalist as its standard bearer. Hoover must be greatly embarrassed in seeking the nomination at the hands of a party he conspired against with the party's opponents to defeat in 1918. It will demand a leader whose Americanism is not in question and whose political views are not a matter of speculation.

But the Senator from Ohio does not talk that way now. Here is my distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], the leader of the Republican Party on the majority side of the Senate——

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. FESS. On October 10, 1918, President Wilson issued his famous letter asking for the election of a Democratic Congress.

Mr. HARRISON. And Mr. Hoover joined in it, and that aroused the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Hoover joined with members of the Cabinet. One member of the Cabinet was Mr. McAdoo, who had stated that the President had done nothing more than Lincoln once did, which, of course, was not a statement of fact. Mr. Hoover made a statement, given out in New York, in which in a way he affirmed the letter of the President; at least I so interpreted it. I was at the time chairman of the committee in charge of the election of a Congress, and I wanted a Republican Congress elected. I thought that Mr. Hoover, a Republican, was going out of his way to join what appeared to me a Democratic propaganda headed by the then President. I thought it was very unfair to the Republicans. Consequently I made a statement at the time condemning what the Food Administrator at that time had said.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; and that aroused the Senator.

Mr. FESS. It did.

Mr. HARRISON. That was one time when Mr. Hoover had a lucid interval, when he wanted a Democratic Congress elected; but, fortunately for the country, we elected a Democratic Congress last year without the help of Mr. Hoover or the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. And the country probably will realize the very evil effects of it before we get through.

Mr. HARRISON. I must apologize to the Senator. Some one remarks that we elected a Democratic Congress with the help of the President and the Senator from Ohio.

The distinguished leader on the Republican side, the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], about the same time, back in 1928, in speaking of Mr. Hoover, said:

> We have come upon strange times. We used to nominate men because of what they stood for. Now we are asked to name voiceless candidates to lead us.

And yet the other night, over the radio, as the distinguished Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] called to the attention of the country the other day, on Lincoln's Birthday, the Senator from Indiana just pushed the memory of Lincoln aside and exploited Mr. Hoover as the superman of all the ages of the world. How do you expect people to have any confidence in what you say when you turn about face so quickly?

I could cite here what the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] said during the Republican convention in Kansas City; but I am too anxious to see harmony within the ranks of the leaders of the Republican Party to do that. I do not want to arouse the old feelings that were engendered at Kansas City. Then, too, I doubt if the rules of the Senate would permit me to quote such language. Indeed, if the Vice President were in the chair—he is not—I could bring back to memory the many nice things that he said at Kansas City about President Hoover. You have changed your tune now. It is altogether different. You have organized different kinds of bands and gangs. You have your gumdrop battalion that is out at work. That is one thing the administration has done. They have made gumdrops famous. They have the petticoat brigade out at work. Of course, it is not headed, in these days, by Mabel Willebrandt. She is too busy, and has been for some time; she is tired from her efforts before the Farm Board up here in getting these large loans and advancements to the President's friends out in California to make this concoction out of grape juice—I do not know exactly what it is called—Vine-Glo, or some such name as that. So she is not now beating the tom-tom. She may come into the picture later. Her place has been usurped by Mrs. Dolly Gann. She is out on the hustings, on a nation-wide tour.

I noticed the other day that Mrs. Gann spoke or gave out an interview in Chicago, and she said, "The Democrats will try to talk about depression, but there is no depression. It is over. They can not make that an issue."

She said:

As a result of constructive measures the President has taken, the great masses of the people have never discovered that they were in hard times and have gone about their mirths and their employments without ever having found it necessary to limit in any degree their standard of living.

That is the kind of political evangelists the Republican Party is sending out to the country to tell them there have been no hard times. There has been mirth in all the homes of the country, perfect contentment, and 100 per cent employment—two chickens in every pot, two cars in every garage, and the people are building more garages. That is the kind of brigade that is working; and, oh, this medicine-ball gang! They are out. Why, one of them helped my distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. FESS] before the Republican National Committee. I refer to Secretary of War Hurley. He showed fire. He had pep. He was tired of the way that other so-called leaders of the Republican Party had acted. They had not defended the President aggressively, as they should have done; so he took the matter in hand, and he pepped up the disconsolate and drooping spirits of the Republican leaders assembled here in Washington on that auspicious occasion and sent them home about one one-thousandth of 1 per cent more enthusiastic than when they came here.

Then they have another one who goes over the country, a remarkable character—I have known him for a long time—Mr. Jahncke; he is the political contortionist of the little cabinet. He can talk as well on one subject as another. Of course, that does not mean much, but he is ever ready to answer every call or demand of his chief. So he goes from Maine to California reading his speeches and praising the work of his chief. He read a speech to some crowd up here in Ohio, and I notice the papers carried the line that Mr. Hoover had shown such wonderful and remarkable qualities of leadership and had thrown so many constructive measures at us that the Democrats had become "dizzy."

Mr. President, some Democrats may have been driven to drink over Mr. Hoover's "leadership" and "constructive administration," and some of them may have been thrown into the very pits of economic despair; but I can not conceive of any Democrat getting dizzy from any quality of leadership displayed by the gentleman in the White House. He has taken us in merry-go-rounds, it is true; he has taken us down the slides, so to speak, and we may have become a little bit dizzy from that, but not from any qualities of leadership that he has shown. We may have become dizzy from trying to find out when he was going to act, and what side he was going to take when he did act; but that is the only time any Democrat has become dizzy about Mr. Hoover.

These are remarkable gentlemen that you are sending out over the country to engage in this campaign.

Now, Mr. President, let us look back and see what is the record. Let us stop for a minute blowing bubbles, as these members of the petticoat brigade and the gumdrop battalion, and the medicine-ball gang are doing.

I recall those glowing words in a very beautiful song, penned many years ago, and I am reminded of it when I listen to my friend from Ohio over the radio—not in the Senate any more. He has not the nerve to defend the President, and his remarkable work, here. When I hear his remarks over the radio, and all these other broadcast speeches in regard to the high quality of the work of Mr. Hoover as President, I am reminded of these words in this song:

We're forever blowing bubbles,
Pretty bubbles in the air.
They fly so high, nearly reach the sky,
Then, like a dream, they fade and die.
Fortune's always hiding,
We've looked everywhere.
We're forever blowing bubbles,
Pretty bubbles in the air.

That is what the American people know they are doing; that is what for the most part Mr. Hoover as President has done. Why, Mr. President, you recall that in that remarkable campaign of prejudice and intolerance, when they prophesied continued prosperity and fooled the people and people fell for it, a promise was exacted of Mr. Hoover; and he, frightened over the outcome of the election, promised that he would call an extra session of Congress should he become President of the United States. So he did call that extraordinary session of Congress; and it is well to-day, three years from that time, for us to refresh our memories as to the character of campaign that was waged and the prophecies that fell not only from the lips of my friends from Ohio and Indiana and Utah but from the lips of every Republican orator who went on the stump, exploiting the prosperity of the country. "It is always with us," they said, "when the Republicans control the country. Panics never come. Despair is never in the wake of the people. Industrial skies are always black with smoke from prosperous plants. People are ever employed. Profits are high; banks are intact, and there can not be an economic depression while the Republicans are in power."

One of the most remarkable documents that has been printed in a long time is this little red book that tells the story and the record of Mr. Hoover. It is entitled "Oh, yeah?" Even children laugh at it. The country everywhere knows of this remarkable record, and so it has been dramatized in this book—"Oh, yeah?" This chart shows the way that stock values for two and a half years have declined from the high peaks down into the low valleys. Then it puts together some remarkable utterances, including those of the distinguished Senator who now has opposition in Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS], who was then one of the spokesmen of the administration, and who said on October 24, 1928:

The single issue in the presidential campaign is, How can we best maintain and increase prosperity in America, and who is the man to do it?

The Vice President, speaking in 1928 as a vice presidential candidate, said:

The only issue in this campaign is the continued prosperity of the American people.

Then, again, at Gary, Ind., the Vice President said:

Stick to the full dinner pail.

Ah! That pail has turned out to be nothing but an old empty can.

You have been enjoying Republican prosperity. If you want to continue the prosperity of the administrations of Calvin Coolidge, vote for Hoover.

That is what Candidate Curtis said.

Then the President himself, at Palo Alto, away out in the home of his distinguished friend and colleague from California [Mr. JOHNSON], spoke eloquently of the great work in the past of the Republican Party; and to those good people out there, many of whom were friends of my friend from California who now presides over this body, he said:

Unemployment in the sense of distress is widely disappearing. * * * We in America to-day are nearer to the final triumph over poverty than ever before in the history of any land. The poorhouse is vanishing from among us. We have not yet reached the goal, but, given a chance to go forward with the policies of the last eight years, and we shall soon, with the help of God, be in sight of the day when poverty will be banished from this Nation. There is no guaranty against poverty equal to a job for every man. That is the primary purpose of the economic policies we advocate.

I shall not burden the RECORD with more of these expressions. Here they are. That was the campaign.

I have before me advertisements, paid for by the Republican National Campaign Committee. One of them reads:

Vote for Hoover.

They appeared in all the magazines and periodicals of the country.

Wages, dividends, progress, and prosperity.
The Republican Party isn't a "poor man's party." Republican prosperity has erased that degrading phrase from our political vocabulary.

Under high tariff and lower taxation, America has stabilized output, employment, and dividend rates.

I have an advertisement here which says that this man is ten men in one, and that the American people can not take the chance of not electing him President of the United States.

What a man!

Could any Republican who voted for Mr. Hoover at the last election have doubted, in view of these remarkable statements over the radio, statements before them in advertisements, statements carried upon the wings of a whispering campaign, that if he should be elected prosperity would continue and we would never have any cause for legislative enactment to cure the economic situation?

What has happened? This man, who is a great leader, called Congress together in April for the purpose of enacting farm relief and for tariff revision, limited tariff revision. Let us see what happened.

We tried to give to the farmers of the country real relief. A fight ensued here for weeks and for weeks, and over the strenuous opposition and objections and protestations of the Senator from Ohio, the leader of the Republican Party and the spokesman of this administration upon this floor, we won out, and then we were defeated by the President. He had his way. He got his Farm Board. I shall not say more about that.

If you think you can make the farmers believe that they have been materially helped by the farm relief legislation you put over, you are indeed an optimist. It has created confusion. It has cost several hundred million dollars, and certainly they can not complain that the Democratic Party did not assist in making appropriations, because we laid in their laps $500,000,000. That is the farm relief the Republican Party of this administration gave to the farmers.

You will not talk about it much in the coming campaign, will you? You will not even attempt to defend that "farm relief." You will just ignore that part of the campaign. You will not have the courage to go before the farmers of this country and defend such an act as that.

Oh, I suppose my friend from Ohio might do it, because somehow or other he does not mind getting into hot water. [Laughter.]

Then he said that we must revise the tariff, must have a limited revision. We went to work on that. Of course, there was no demand for a revision of the tariff upward. In the Fordney-McCumber law you had put on the statute books tariff rates higher than had ever been enacted up to that time. There were certainly no demands at the time the extra session was called in 1929 for an increase in tariff rates in this country. Yet, when you got together here and allotted the chairmanship of this subcommittee to this apostle of special interests, and that one over to another, giving to Mr. REED, of course, the steel schedule, giving to Mr. BINGHAM the schedule which carried the articles and things in which his State was interested, and over to Mr. SMOOT the sugar schedule, about which he has talked more than any other subject in the world, then you went to work and increased the rates over the House rates in 872 instances, giving to the American people a tariff bill which has wrecked this country.

I say "wrecked this country," and I offer no apologies for saying that. Let Mr. Jahncke and Mr. Hurley and the other members of the medicine-ball gang go forth and say that one Democrat in the Senate said that that tariff law had wrecked this country, because I will admit it, and when we take up a tariff bill shortly we are going to show you. We will not convince you, because you will not be convinced. You know in your hearts it is true, but you want at least to protest that you still believe, with the old reactionary element of the Republican Party, in these excessive rates of protection which amount to embargoes.

The most pitiful picture that has ever been offered by any President of the United States in all the history of this Republic was portrayed to the Congress and to the country during the consideration of the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill. Here we were for months almost in a death grapple, the progressives and the Democratic Party fighting against the reactionary leadership of the Republican Party with reference to a tariff policy. We cried out in our weak voices on this floor to the President of the United States to take a hand against this conspiracy which had been concocted in the closed rooms of these representatives of special interests and to employ the power of his office and his influence on the side of the people against these high and excessive rates attempted to be foisted upon the people.

Protests came from foreign countries in greater number than ever before, in stronger language than they had ever employed, stating to us as a country that "If you dare do this, we will be forced to retaliate, to organize cartels, to boycott, to raise our rates against the importations of your goods into our countries."

Ah, they laughed about it. In derision did the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Utah speak. How eloquently did the distinguished leader on the other side say, "Oh, it is the usual, old custom of foreign countries to protest on the consideration of any tariff bill."

Yet we have lived to see that very prophecy they made come true, that very threat they uttered carried out. I remember that day when, in dramatic fashion, 1,089 of the greatest economists of this country, from every part of the land, signed a letter to the President, or to the Congress, I have forgotten which.

In this protest of the economists they laid down with remarkable accuracy just what would happen if this scheme written in the pages of the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill were carried out. They told us how it would increase unemployment in the United States. They told us how increased rates would be levied by foreign countries in retaliation on account of our action. They told us how factories which had built up an American trade throughout the world, and had increased our exports to a higher figure than they had ever reached before, would fall; that we would lose those markets; and how those owning those factories would be compelled to go to Canada and to Europe and elsewhere and build new factories, giving employment to foreign labor, making products to be sold in competition with our own.

The figures show that their prophecy has come true, and we have seen the exports of this country fall off from the last year under the old law, even—from more than $5,000,000,000—to this last year, when they amounted to a little more than $2,000,000,000. We have hardly a balance of trade now in our favor.

Of course, these factories have closed down, because those who ran them have built factories elsewhere. Of course, unemployment has increased in industrial centers, because the labor of foreign countries is being employed.

Mr. Morrow, whose memory we all respect, and whose striking personality we liked, said this in a speech at Newark when he was a candidate for the Senate:

All parties in the past, including the Republican Party, have been wont to credit themselves with whatever good times happened during their term of power, without looking for the deeper reasons that underlie the ebb and flow of prosperity. Any party that takes credit for the rain must not be surprised if its opponents blame it for the drought.

So the Republican Party takes credit for the prosperity, and it must take whatever discredit attaches for the economic drought now hovering over this country. What these economists said has come true. You have wrecked the economic and industrial life of this country; and Mr. Hoover, as he sat as the commanding figure of the Republican Party, certainly in the most influential position of anyone in this country, kept his lips sealed; he refused to take into his confidence any leader of the Republican Party and tell him how he felt on any question touching the tariff proposal.

That is the kind of leadership you have had. That is the character of leadership that has been displayed by the superman who now sits in the White House. I lay it down in all sincerity, Mr. President, that he showed during the tariff fight less qualities of leadership, more indecision, less courage than any President has ever shown in all the history of the country.

Oh, yes, there are some romantic incidents connected with all that history, though. We made a fight for the flexible tariff provision. The sentiment of the country was with us. We were in conference. Senators will remember the ride of the four horsemen from the Rapidan one night about 2 o'clock in the morning. I think it was at a time before they had paved the road that led to the Rapidan. I think it was at a time when it took quite a while to get there over those rocky, bumpy places. It was before the marines got to work down there smoothing out the rough places. On this night, as the papers heralded the next day, those four distinguished Senators came—not as Paul Revere, because they did not ride horseback; they could not. Perhaps they rode in a White House automobile. But they came up here to straighten it all out and bring the news from the President so the Republican leadership would not give up to the progressive Republicans and the Democrats in the flexible-tariff fight. Thus one of the achievements of the administration was the midnight ride of the "four horsemen of the Rapidan."

There will be much said about the tariff in this campaign. It can not be claimed that it brought all the prosperity about which the Republicans talked. They will not admit, either, but will try to fool the people that it did not bring about this panic, this stock crash, this value depreciation, this increased unemployment, and all the heavy hearts and wrecked ambitions that we have witnessed in this country. They will keep pretty quiet, too, on that proposition.

Then what happened? We had the stock crash in September or October, 1929. Values to the extent of more than $5,000,000,000 were wiped out. What did the superman do? What did his great Secretary of the Treasury do? Mr. Hoover gave out a statement and said:

> Prosperity will soon return. This is just a seasonal matter. Prosperity is just around the corner.

Mr. Mellon chipped in and made similar observations.

Oh, no; Mr. Hoover did something else. After a little while, when prosperity did not come according to the time he said, Mr. Hoover sent for all of the great business men of the country, the captains of industry everywhere, and said to them, "Gentlemen, steam up. Let us not have a depression under a Republican rule. It will not do. It is contrary to everything we have preached in the past. Buckle on your armor and help me out in this crisis. Do not reduce wages. Put more money into more improvements. Go back to your homes and help out." They went back to their homes and in a few days, of course, they began to reduce wages. They did not begin to enlarge their operations but they began to reduce their operations. Mr. Ford, who came out the other day for Mr. Hoover as a great man to be reelected, was one of the first to close down and the balance of them followed suit.

Then Mr. Hoover said:

> I am going to ask that the Federal Government appropriate money for public improvements and public works.

He started on that line for a while, but again he shifted. He then came out and at the end of his third year as President he announces an economy program. In everything he has done, except the tariff and farm relief—and he can have all the credit he wants for them—he has been driven to his position. He is certainly the procrastinator of all ages. Tell me in the situation that has continued now for over two years and a half that the man who has directed the affairs of the Government, that let it exist and continue for more than two years and then acted, shows a remarkable degree of leadership?

He let the Congress last year in March adjourn over the protest of many congressional leaders. He sent us home and gave the impression to the country that if the Congress was in Washington in session it would terrify business and that things would get worse. He said, "Give business a time to rest. If Congress gets away, things will come back all right." He was just going to wave that magic wand, and magician that he was, turn the trick, and things would be all right. But it has not brought about any relief to the country.

The situation went on and on and got worse and worse. Appeals came for him to call the Congress in session in order that we might do something. He may have been moved a little bit about it. Perhaps he called in some of his reactionary friends, like my friend from Ohio [Mr. FESS], but they said to him, "No; do not get that crowd together down here. They will scare business again. They will frighten it, and the whole economic situation will get worse." So he refused to call Congress together. He telephoned a lot of us or telegraphed a lot of us; he asked a lot of us to come to Washington and to confer about it, and legislated through a correspondence-school course, but still he would not call Congress into session.

That is another remarkable achievement of this remarkable superman that has pushed Lincoln off the boards on Lincoln's Birthday, and Washington on February 22. In December Congress convened. Will anyone else on the other side rise and tell me a thing he did in the meanwhile? I pause for a reply.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COUZENS in the chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I think I ought to challenge the Senator from Mississippi on that point. He has been speaking of the orations that were delivered about Mr. Hoover on Washington's Birthday and Lincoln's Birthday, but I want to call his attention to the fact that there is still another birthday coming which is much greater than either Lincoln's or Washington's. It is true that the Hoover spellbinders on Lincoln's Birthday compared Mr. Hoover to Lincoln, and Mr. Lincoln came out at the little end of the horn, naturally. When Washington's Birthday came he was compared with Washington, and of course Washington got the worst of it.

But the Senator from Mississippi must not claim those two instances as the only possible victories for Mr. Hoover. There is still another birthday coming, and I think the country will wait with almost breathless interest the coming of that other birthday when another comparison will be made and greater laurels will be laid upon Mr. Hoover's brow. Wait until the 25th of December, Christmas Day, and listen to the comparisons then! [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRISON. I have no doubt that will be quite true. Then I would suggest, too, that on the 1st day of April they ought to make some speeches to the American people praising Mr. Hoover. [Laughter.]

Well, Congress convened in December by law, not by the call of the President. Let us see as to these remarkable measures that will be claimed as some of the great achievements of this great administration. First was the moratorium granting a year's suspension on interallied governmental debts. I voted for that legislation. Many Democrats voted for it. We did not permit it to become a partisan matter. It could not have been passed except with the cooperation of the Democrats in both the House and the Senate. We stood for that measure because we did not want it to be said of the Democratic Party that we were trying to hamstring the President even in one thing that he was suggesting that might tend to restore economic conditions in the country. So we went through with that provision. We were hopeful it would help. We wanted to be of assistance to the country.

But we must remember, Mr. President, that when Mr. Hoover came to Congress and asked us to pass that moratorium legislation, although he disclaimed that he had changed his views with reference to the cancellation of the foreign debt, yet at the same time in that message he asked us to re-create the World War Foreign Debt Funding Commission so that they might study the present conditions of these foreign debtors and their ability to pay. But even though he appealed for that legislation evidently for the purpose of bringing in some report to modify the debt-funding agreement, the Democratic House of Representatives turned it down and the Senate turned it down.

So far as I know—and if I am mistaken I want some one now to correct me—I do not recall a single satellite of the administration who suggested, by bill or otherwise, that the Debt Funding Commission should be re-created or resurrected. On the other hand, when the bill passed the House granting the 1-year moratorium, there was written into the measure a provision that the policy of the Congress was that it should not be construed in any way as favoring cancellation of foreign debts in any particular. I think even though we enacted that legislation, and with whatever harm there might be in it as thought by some, the provision we wrote into it over the objection of the administration and against the suggestion of the President, that the policy of the Government was that foreign nations should pay their debts and that the legislation should not be construed as any part of a debt-cancellation program, was worth the passing of the legislation. So it was that the Democrats and the progressive Republicans wrote into the law that provision announcing our debt-cancellation policy.

What else? The administration came in with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation proposal. First they were going to have a national credit association by means of which the banks were going to pool a lot of resources and make some loans. That probably helped some; at least we hope it did. But if it was good in January or December, two or three months ago, why was not the plan good two and a half years ago when conditions warranted such action? Why was it not good six months or a year ago? We passed the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act. In that case the Democrats cooperated with the administration, and when Senators on the other side go out and claim as an achievement of the Republican administration the passage of that act—and it was a nonpartisan measure and stated so to be by the President—let them not forget that the only relief that was given to the farmers of this country was written into the pages of that particular legislation, and it was done over the objection of the administration; it was done notwithstanding the opposition of the reactionary Republican leadership in this body and in the House of Representatives. There was written into that measure a provision that $50,000,000 should be appropriated to be loaned to the farmers of the country. That amount was increased by the Democratic House of Representatives so that the farmers might be able to borrow $200,000,000 from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. So that is an achievement not of the administration but of the Democratic Party and of the progressive element of the Republican Party in the American Congress.

Likewise to claim as an achievement of the present administration the passage of the bill known as the Glass-Steagall bill is preposterous. It embodies provisions which have been advocated by Democrats for a long time. No one ever heard the President whispering to anyone that he advocated it. It was introduced and championed in the House of Representatives by a Democrat, Mr. STEAGALL; it was championed in this body and engineered to success by a Democratic ex-Secretary of the Treasury, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. How can Republican leadership lay claim to any undue credit for that particular act?

In the Federal land bank legislation, it was the Democrats and progressive Republicans, over the objection of the administration, who embodied the provision of allocating $25,000,000 of $125,000,000 in permitting delinquent borrowers to obtain extensions to meet their installment payments.

And so, Mr. President, is the empty record of the Hoover administration. It has turned prosperity away. Its achievements have been the highest tariff, the highest number of unemployed, the highest Treasury deficit, the highest number of bank failures—there were 491 banks to close in 1928—but in 1929, there were 642; in 1930, 1,345; and last year there were 2,298. In the last three years there have been nine times as many bank failures as there were during the whole eight years of the Wilson administration. Indeed, during the month of January this year there were as many bank failures as during the whole eight years of the Wilson administration. The highest number of business failures, the highest cost of government, the highest loss in the Government revenues, the highest wage loss to labor. That is the record of achivements of the Republican Party. Their prolific promises and promises of prosperity have produced only a pitiful economic paralysis.

Mr. President, we have heard a good deal about the reorganization of the departments of the Government; Mr. Hoover has talked about it; Mr. Harding talked about it; other Republicans have talked about it; but instead of retrenching and reorganizing they have spent more money than former administrations and have reorganized the least. The House of Representatives in five appropriation bills, which they have already passed, have cut the estimate of the Budget Bureau and the recommendations of the President of the United States more than $100,000,000. Yet the President talks about his economy.

So, Mr. President, this administration has been a weak, dismal failure. The American people know it; they can not be fooled about it. All this talk about a "superman" who has waited two years and a half even to suggest something—and whatever has been suggested along this line has been of a nonpartisan character—to allay the ills from which the country is suffering can not fool anybody. Every expression of the people since Mr. Hoover became President and made a failure has been against him. From one end of the country to the other the people have expressed their choice for Democrats who were running for office. They gave to the country a Democratic House of Representatives. That body has performed well; it has not played peanut politics, and its Members are not going about uttering encomiums as to its accomplishments, as some of the satellites of the administration have done concerning the Republican administration. We must keep the record straight.

The people in the State of my friend the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] were so disgusted with the Hoover policies—and their action was not due to the liquor question or to the desire to obtain beer—with Mr. Hoover and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] and the other Republican leaders, because of the way they had acted here in Washington, that they turned a strong Republican district into a strong Democratic district, indeed, into a district which may become a Democratic Gibraltar.

So a Democrat was elected to Congress a few weeks ago in the State of my friend the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], who once was chairman of the Republican senatorial campaign committee. Up there amid the snows of New Hampshire, although he stumped the State, talking in behalf of his friend, former Governor Bartlett—and former Governor Bartlett is a good fellow, as good as Republicans grow; but, of course, that is not much, though it is something [laughter]—a Democrat was elected. The Senator from New Hampshire went up there; he spoke and exploited himself and made an appeal for the people to stand by Mr. Hoover; that they needed another Republican in Congress, because the vote there was so close that if the New Hampshire district was lost the Democrats would elect a Speaker of the House of Representatives. The people of New Hampshire did not believe the Senator from that State; they did not accept this fine character, Mr. Bartlett, and even in that old snow-bound, rock-ribbed State, which had not gone Democratic for a long time, they said to the Republicans, "Shoo, get out of here," and they did. [Laughter.]

Then in Michigan, in the State of my friend [Mr. COUZENS], who now presides over this body, a Democrat was elected to the House in a Republican district. I do not know when that district ever went Democratic before. I have been here a good while and I do not recall that it ever went Democratic. I am told it has never been Democratic since the War between the States. So Michigan has done one good thing besides sending the senior Senator from that State to the Senate. The people there would not listen to the Hoover appeal. They were disgusted. They knew that at Flint, at Detroit, and at many other industrial centers there were more people unemployed than ever before in the history of those cities; that plants had been moved over across the border into Canada, giving employment to foreign people; and so they said, "You can not fool us; you have been fooling us a long time; you have been getting into office on shams and Wickershams [laughter] for a long time, but we are not going to let you do so any more." So they drove the Republican Party out of power in that district.

So it goes throughout the country. The voters are on fire against the Republican Party. I look almost with humility on what the vote is going to be in November. It is going to be so tremendously Democratic that many of the fine men on the other side whose benign countenances have graced this body for so long and who have voted so often so badly will be here no more.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator may not know of it, but an effort is being made to stem the tide. My spies inform me that many Republican song writers have been called into conference to write a song for the marching Republican clubs during the next campaign. They were instructed to write a song that would be accurate and would cause the people to turn to them. So, to the tune "Will you love me in December as you did in May," they proposed the following song:

Will you vote in this November
As you did on one fine day?
Will you vote in the good old-fashioned way
When your assets are all gone
And the soup line's very long?
Will you vote in this November
As you did on yesterday?

[Laughter.]

Mr. HARRISON. I thank my friend from Maryland for his contribution.

Mr. President, I hold in my hand a little memento of former days. Many of my Republican brethren saw it; a good many of them gave such mementos away in the campaign. I suppose my friend the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] gave a good many of them away. I do not know that my friend from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] gave any of them away, because the memento is represented to be gold. Of course, it is not gold—when a Republican uses gold he expects something real—so this is one of those spurious coins so representative of the Republican Party. It was used in the campaign three years ago. I do not know who originated the idea; perhaps it was my friend from Ohio. However, it is supposed to represent a quarter, and on it appears a representation of a big elephant with the motto, "Hoover lucky pocket piece. Good for four years of prosperity." I have retained one as a wonderful specimen of Republican hypocrisy, as a fine evidence of Republican sham and deceit three years ago. Whatever kind of memento the Republican managers may get out for the next campaign I am sure they will not say, "Good for four years of prosperity."

Mr. President, in conclusion, when I think of the achievements of the administration I am reminded of a letter that I received the other day from a doctor, who is a friend of mine. He said there was an old darky who came around and worked on his lawn on occasions. One morning Bill came and was looking disconsolate and disgusted with the world. The doctor said, "What is the matter, Bill? Are you not feeling well?" Bill replied, "No, sir, boss; I'se feeling pretty bad; sho' feels bad. I eats one job before I gets another. I guess we ought not be downhearted, though, 'cause we's got such a good President. Yas, sir; he's the best President what we's ever had." The doctor said, "Well, Bill, why do you think that Mr. Hoover is such a great man?" Bill answered, "'Cause he done give us so much rest." [Laughter.] And so he has, Mr. President.

GEORGE WASHINGTON AS A JUDGE

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I do not intend to take any time of my friend from Mississippi or any other Senator who desires to make the type of speech the Senator from Mississippi has made to-day. From the standpoint of Republican success, I sincerely hope that he will make another such speech to-morrow and continue to make them right along. He made one yesterday, and then subsequently, by his vote on an amendment which was presented, showed his sincerity. Now he has made another speech. I know of nothing that will be of more benefit to the Republican Party than just that sort of a speech, and I hope he will read the leading editorial in the New York Times of to-day on that very thing. I do not intend to enter into any discussion. I rose for a different purpose.

In the American Bar Association Journal for March there appears one of the most notable articles on one phase of the life of Washington that has come to light. This article deals with Washington the judge, a subject that has never been amplified. It is written by our good friend, Hon. R. Walton Moore, the distinguished lawyer, at one time president, as I recall, of the Bar Association of Virginia, and also a distinguished ex-Member of the House of Representatives from the district in which Mount Vernon is located. I have read the article; it contains very much new material and is all from original sources. I should like to have it receive a wider reading than will be given it from having it in this journal. I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that will be done.

The article referred to is as follows:

GEORGE WASHINGTON AS A JUDGE AND HIS ATTITUDE TOWARD COURTS AND LAWYERS—IN ALL THAT HAS BEEN WRITTEN ABOUT WASHINGTON THE FACT HAS NOT BEEN STRESSED THAT HE WAS ONE OF THE JUDGES OF A COURT POSSESSING EXTENSIVE JURISDICTION AND INEVITABLY PROFITED BY THE CONTACTS AND INFORMATION INCIDENTAL TO THAT SERVICE—COUNTY COURT IN HIS TIME THE MOST IMPORTANT TRIBUNAL IN VIRGINIA—HIS WORK AS ONE OF THE "GENTLEMEN JUSTICES," ETC.

(By Hon. R. Walton Moore, former president of Virginia Bar Association and former Member of House of Representatives from the Mount Vernon district)

Washington was through with school in the ordinary sense of the term when, about 15 years old, he took up his residence with his brother at Mount Vernon. In a letter to his mother attributed, perhaps mistakenly, to Lord Fairfax, the writer was correct in saying "his education might have been bettered" but correct in predicting, on the basis of his estimate of the youth's unusual qualities, that he "would go to school all his life and profit thereby." In that way certainly no one of the time had more opportunity or was a more intelligent and receptive student. Much has been written of how he was thus trained at almost every step for the great tasks which awaited him, for example, by his service as a young surveyor in a wild and thinly settled region, as a young soldier in the frontier wilderness, as a member of the colonial house of burgesses, and a Member of the Continental Congress.

But the fact seems not to have been at all stressed that for years he was one of the judges of a court possessing extensive jurisdiction and inevitably profited by the contacts and information incident to that service. While it is mainly the present purpose to say something about that one element of the education which the Fairfax letter predicted for him, a further word or so may be permitted with respect to his protracted legislative career as a burgess during the period from 1759 to 1775 and as a Delegate to the first and second sessions of the Continental Congress. In the House of Burgesses his associates were the ablest and most accomplished Virginia contemporaries, and in Congress the most eminent men of the thirteen Colonies. Of course, not as a speechmaker, but by his industry and wisdom, he won the admiration and confidence of his colleagues. Convincing proof of this is that in 1774 the house selected him as one of the seven Delegates of the first Congress. He was placed in distinguished company. The others were Benjamin Harrison, Richard Henry Lee, Richard Bland, Peyton Randolph, Edmund Pendleton, and Patrick Henry, the last three remarkable lawyers. As to how he was regarded in Congress, there is the testimony of Henry, who was destined to be offered by President Washington the post of Chief Justice of the Supreme Court. Henry, answering an inquiry, said: "If you speak of eloquence, Mr. Rutledge, of South Carolina, is by far the greatest orator, but if you speak of solid information and sound judgment, Colonel Washington is unquestionably the greatest man on that floor."

A recent writer says that when Washington returned to Mount Vernon in 1758, after British rule had been pretty firmly established in the West, he led "the quiet life of a country gentleman." But the life of a man could not have been very quiet who, besides his legislative duties, closely looked after his own large estate and the large estates of his wife and stepson, was busy with the affairs of the church as an energetic member of the vestry of his parish at a time when it had serious official responsibilities, who traveled much in and out of Virginia, and was exceptionally active in political and social relations with the influential people of the Colony. Added to all this, it is clear that not later than the spring of 1768 and thence on until the outbreak of the Revolution, he was a justice of the peace, and as such not only charged with disposing of minor cases but, along with other justices, was engaged in conducting the business of the county court of his county. As one may see from the court minutes, they were invariably, when holding court, styled "gentlemen justices." Due to the loss of colonial records showing the appointment of justices and the absence here of information understood to be available in England, where there are copies of those records, it is not possible at this moment to determine the precise date when Washington's judicial career started. But there remain two of the Fairfax County court order books covering the period from 1770 to 1775 which, if there were no other reason, are worth examining as an example of the beautiful and still perfectly clear writing of the old-time clerks who wrote up the minutes of the court proceedings.

From these two books it appears that Washington served in the court from 1770 to 1774. It is otherwise shown, however, that his service began prior to 1770, for turning to the first volume of his diaries, which give bare facts with little or no comment, there is this entry under date of April 18, 1768: "Went to court and returned in the evening." Then follow at intervals more than 20 such entries. Now and then they show that the sessions of the court ran several days. For instance, on June 20, 1769, having been at court the day before, the entry is: "Went up to court again and returned in the evening with Colonel Mason, Mr. Scott, and Mr. Bryan Fairfax," all of whom were justices. Mason, as we all know, was the author of the Virginia constitution of 1776, which included the Bill of Rights, this the first instrument ever written and promulgated which set up a complete system of government. Though not a practicing lawyer, he was deeply versed in the history and philosophy of the law. He was Washington's near neighbor and friend and one of his most trusted advisors. For instance, the day and evening before the famous Fairfax resolves were adopted by the citizens of Fairfax in 1774, he and Washington in conference at Mount Vernon agreed on the elaborate statement of the grievances and rights of the colonists which was embodied in the resolves, and the next day went from Mount Vernon to the meeting at the county seat in Alexandria, at which Washington presided. The last entry in the diaries relative to the court is June 17, 1774, subsequent to which date Washington was doubtless too much engrossed by affairs affecting the entire country to have much time for local matters.

Along with Mason the 1774 meeting had the benefit of the presence of Robert Hanson Harrison, a learned lawyer, who was a leader of the bar of Fairfax County while Washington was a member of the court. In many a case he had seen Harrison's character and ability tested, and he singled him out as one of a group of great lawyers, among them Marshall and Hamilton, on whom at various stages of his career he was accustomed to rely when the most dependable counsel was needed. Harrison was not only at his side when the resolves flung defiance at the Crown but at his side as a member of his staff during the Revolution, and when he became President he commissioned him as one of the original appointees to the Supreme Court. Turning again to the diaries, there is found this interesting entry dated February 6, 1790: "The resignation of Mr. Harrison as an associate judge (he declined the appointment a few days after being commissioned, preferring to be chancellor of the State of Maryland), making the nomination of some other character to supply his place necessary, I determined after contemplating every character which presented itself to my view to name Mr. Iredell, of North Carolina. * * * I had recourse to every means of information in my power and found them all concurring in his favor." In passing it may be noted that Iredell, who was to have a fine career in the court, was a native of England and his wife a sister of Dr. Samuel Johnson.

The evidence is abundant that no one has had more respect than Washington for the legal profession and that no President has been more solicitous about the importance of the judiciary and the maintenance of its integrity and strength. This is variously indicated. To illustrate, it is indicated by the appointments he made when he took up his duties as President and it is indicated in his letter to Edmund Randolph when he invited him to become Attorney General. "Impressed," he wrote Randolph, "that the true administration of justice is the firmest pillar of good government, I have considered the first arrangement of the judicial department as essential to the happiness of our country and the stability of its political institutions. Hence the selection of the fittest characters to expound the laws and dispense justice has been an invariable subject of my most anxious concern." It can be believed that such a high conception was in no small measure derived from his own participation in the work of expounding the laws and dispensing justice and that this was a factor in the education which it was predicted he would acquire.

In Washington's time and long before and after the county court was the most important tribunal in Virginia. While he was serving, with the exception of comparatively trifling cases, it had unlimited jurisdiction of civil cases, law and chancery, of probate matters, and of a large class of criminal cases. It had wide administrative powers touching the fiscal affairs of the county, the construction of public buildings, the laying out and construction of highways, building bridges, providing and operating ferries, the care of orphan children, the licensing of innkeepers and the fixing of their charges. Relative to the last matter, the order books show that periodically the rates to be charged for liquor, the surprisingly many kinds then in use being enumerated, and for lodging and food were determined by the court. Very commonly the final item in the list is, "For a night's lodging, with clean sheets, 6d., otherwise nothing." The trifling nature from our point of view of some of the business of the court can not prevent us from seeing that very much of it was of a kind to require able and discerning men on the bench and lawyers who were representative of the learning and skill of the profession.

Justices for a county were appointed by the governor, not fewer than eight and often more, there being no restriction as to the number. They remained in office indefinitely, and the court recommended appointments to fill vacancies. Without the presence of four no court could be held. The clerk was an appointee of the court and in effect so was the sheriff, though he held his commission from the governor. The justices were not lawyers but nearly always the most prominent and reliable citizens of their county. They received no compensation whatever. They were thought sufficiently compensated by the honor of holding an office regarded as of outstanding importance and dignity with the opportunity of contributing to the common good by attending to the settlement of small controversies out of court, and in court by taking part in the performance of duties which affected the property and liberty of persons and the general welfare of the public. When the Virginia Constitutional Convention of 1829–30 had under discussion the county court, then composed and having much the same jurisdiction as in Washington's day, Chief Justice Marshall, a member of the convention, said: "It was the truth that no State in the Union had hitherto more internal quiet than Virginia. There is no part of America where less discord, less ill feeling between man and man, is to be found than in this Commonwealth, and he firmly believed that that state of things was mainly to be ascribed to the practical operation of our county courts. The magistrates who composed these courts consisted in general of the best men in their respective counties. It was mainly due to their influence that so much harmony existed in the State. His emphatic opinion was that these courts must be preserved." Supporting Marshall's view, another member, Philip P. Barbour, who was appointed to the Supreme Court by President Jackson, said he had practiced in those courts for a quarter of a century and he could say with the utmost truth that his confidence in them had grown with his growth and strengthened with his strength. At the same time Benjamin Watkins Leigh said he had heard of but two instances of corruption in the county courts in 200 years. As to alleged incompetency and ignorance he had seen county courts which were among the ablest tribunals before which he had practiced. Speaking of the type of men who served in these courts, it will be remembered that both Jefferson and Madison were justices; that Monroe, after two terms in the Presidency, accepted an appointment and served as a justice in his county, and that in 1784 the victor of the Revolution was named as a justice for Fairfax County.

That the county court had a central place in the estimation of the public is easy to understand. The population was sparse and the people mainly engaged in agriculture. There were no cities and few villages large enough to be called towns. It was at the county seat when the court was in session that the inhabitants gathered. From several historians, including Fiske, we have this picture: The court day was a holiday for all the countryside, particularly in the fall and spring. From all directions came in the people on horseback, in wagons, and on foot. On the courthouse green assembled people of all classes—the hunter from the backwoods, the owner of a few acres, and the great landowner. Old debts were settled and new ones made; there were auctions, transfers of property, and if election times were near stump speaking, when questions pertaining more or less to some real or fancied encroachment on popular liberty of the Crown were apt to be debated. All else aside, as one of the historians has remarked, the county court was one of the main agencies of spreading political education. In every way it was one of the agencies which furthered the education of Washington according to the prediction which had been made.

Perhaps before he had any idea of being identified with the court, Washington must have frequently witnessed such a scene as that just outlined. Such was probably the scene when in his eighteenth year he appeared in the court of Culpeper County to qualify as the surveyor of that county, and such may have been the scene when four years afterwards, on March 17, 1754, he appeared early one morning in the Fairfax court and presented his commission from the governor as lieutenant colonel (he was preparing to set out on the campaign to the West, the year before starting on the fatal expedition with Braddock) and took the prescribed oaths. The courts were not leisurely. In spite of the fact that the justices sometimes had to travel a considerable distance over wretched roads to the county seat, the Fairfax court never convened later than 9 o'clock. Our ancestors seem to have been very industrious in discharging official duties and to have attached high value to the oaths under which they acted. On the occasions just mentioned Washington "took the usual oaths to his majesty's person and government, and took and subscribed the abjuration oath and test," and in Culpeper took also the oath as surveyor. The oath which was subscribed was a disclaimer of belief in the theological doctrine of transubstantiation.

Though a layman, Washington as a member of the court necessarily progressed in his knowledge of the law and of the importance of those who were trained in that profession. That he consulted statutes and law books bearing upon such matters as he was obliged to deal with is reasonably evident from the number of such works listed in the inventory of his estate. It will be plain to anyone who reads the statutes prescribing the jurisdiction and procedure of the courts that he could not have escaped becoming fairly familiar with the rules of pleadings and practice, with the distinction between law suits and chancery suits and the methods of conducting both, with attachment and injunction, with the organization and functioning of grand juries and trial juries, with the means of executing judgments and decrees, with the duties of clerks, sheriffs and other officials. He necessarily became saturated with a good deal of the knowledge and acquired to some extent the habits of mind now assumed to be confined to those who have been equipped for judicial work by long study and then by some experience at the bar.[1] Several years ago in an address lauding the Virginia county court system, the late Holmes Conrad, who was Solicitor General under President Cleveland, not with Washington or any other particular man in view, visualized what occurred when a planter of high character and strong sense, but unlearned in the law, became identified with the court, and in reading what he says we may think of its application to Washington. The difficulties which the new judge encountered at the outset are described. He had difficulty in detecting the real questions involved and in following the testimony and argument, and he distrusted the conlusion which he reached. But "after the novelty wears away, he is able to fix his mind upon the business in hand; he detects and is able to follow the clue which leads him through conflicting testimony. He sees dimly at first, but steadily in the light of conscience he discerns the right and wrong of the case; and now he begins to apprehend and appreciate the arguments of advocates. He feels gaining on him a sense of responsibility and the importance of the work. There is slowly but gradually developing the faculties of his mind, of the powers of which he was before unconscious. He is undergoing a process of education, the effects of which become apparent to himself as also to his friends and neighbors. He is no longer led away by first impressions or whatsoever of the mere surface of matters. He learns to hold his judgment in abeyance until his mind is informed and his conscience satisfied. He goes down from his place on the bench and receives the confidence and manifest respect of the people of his locality."

Whenever it was that Washington qualified as a justice he of course took the same oaths as when he qualified as a lieutenant colonel. In addition, he took a lengthy oath as "justice of the peace" and another as "Justice of the County Court of Fairfax in Chancery." In the former he pledged himself, among other things, to "do equal right to the poor and rich after your cunning wit and power according to law; and you shall not be of counsel of any quarrel hanging before you; and the issues, fines, americaments[2] that shall happen to be made, and all forfeitures which shall be before you, you shall cause to be entered without any concealment or any imbeziling."[2] In the latter oath he was pledged to "do equal right to all manner of people, great or small, high and low, rich and poor, according to equity and good conscience and the laws and usages of his colony and dominion of Virginia, without favor, affection, or partiality." The praise that can be given these "gentlemen justices" is that they lived up to their oaths.

There is no way of knowing the extent of Washington's activities as an individual justice having exclusive jurisdiction of a class of minor cases. But as he resided in the most populous section of his county and enjoyed everybody's respect and confidence, it is safe to conjecture it must have been considerable and that he always exerted his influence to quiet controversy and promote the tranquil condition for which Marshall thought the county court and those composing it were largely responsible.[3]

Far less is known than could be desired of the proceedings of the Fairfax court during Washington's service. The court papers have long since disappeared and about the only source of information are the two order books already mentioned. Looking at the one of them, which runs from April, 1770, to January, 1772, containing 330 pages, it appears that Washington attended over half of the monthly terms, which was more regular than the attendance of a majority of his colleagues, Mason not excepted. In the period to which the book pertains, hundreds of civil cases were brought and in great variety—actions of debt, trespass, trespass on the case, trover and conversion, detinue, replevin, and ejectment. There was constant resort to attachment. There were suits in chancery, and injunctions were issued to restrain the collection of judgments and prevent irremediable injury. The names of the plaintiffs and defendants are always given and often the names of the lawyers, not only Mr. Harrison heretofore spoken of but others still unforgotten, among them William Grayson, who was to be one of the first United States Senators from Virginia; Benjamin Sebastian, ancestor of one of the first Senators from Arkansas; and George Johnston, who was on Washington's staff in the Revolution. He was the son of that George Johnston, like Mason a neighbor and friend of Washington, and one of the leaders of the Virginia bar, who as a member of the house of burgesses in 1765, according to Jefferson, who listened to the debate, delivered a powerful legal argument in support of Henry's resolutions condemning the stamp tax. The resolutions were carried by a very narrow majority and would have been lost but for the votes of Johnston and Washington. The cases were tried by juries unless the defendant failed to appear or waived a trial in that manner, and verdicts and judgments were made payable in tobacco or currency and sometimes partly in each.

Now and then the jurors disagreed after lengthy deliberation, and in one instance a juror was withdrawn and the case continued for "reasons exciting as well the said justices as the said parties"; but the reasons for the excitement are not set out. There were now and then exceptions to the refusal of the court to set aside verdicts, and in a certain case not otherwise notable the bill of exceptions was signed by Washington and sealed with his seal. Delinquent debtors were ordered to be imprisoned and were released after 20 days' confinement upon proof of insolvency. Lawyers were admitted to practice, wills were admitted to probate, letters of administration granted, guardians appointed, and the accounts of fiduciaries passed on. Poor children were directed to be bound out as apprentices and taught trades. There was much done in supervising and enforcing the collection of taxes and making expenditures for local purposes.

Relative to ferries there is this entry: "Ordered, that George Mason and George Washington, Gent., be summoned to appear at the next court to give security according to law for keeping the ferries at their respective landings." Both lived on the shore of the Potomac, and ferries were operated across the river to Maryland. The court was required to see to the construction, when needed, and to the upkeep of the courthouse and jail and warehouses for the storage of tobacco turned in for taxes. In obedience to the statute it had the duty of providing a "pillory, whipping post, and stocks." Notwithstanding, the criminal jurisdiction of the court embraced all offenses except those punishable by death, loss of limb, or outlawry, the order book refers to very few serious offenses. But the court was called on to deal with a great deal of the same comparatively unimportant kind of criminal business which now crowds the dockets of the United States district courts. The order books of the time back of Washington show that many people were charged with not attending their parish churches "within two months last past," with being "idle vagrants," and with "tending of seconds," which meant gathering a second growth of tobacco from the same stalks. The order book now referred to is full of presentments of women for having "base-born children," and people for violating the liquor laws and getting drunk, for violating the Sabbath, for failing to list themselves or their property for taxation, of road overseers and other officials for neglecting their duties. There seems to have been a good deal of profanity. A man would be presented for "prophanely swearing by his God one time," or more than one time might be specified, and there was an individual presented for "prophanely swearing by his God five times within three days." Enough has been said to suggest that here was the one nisi prius court operating in a nearly limitless field conducted by picked men who, albeit laymen, necessarily as the years went on, came to know very much of the law applicable to governmental and personal affairs, and the manner of its administration.

Fairfax County was a part of the princely domain called the Northern Neck of Virginia, of which Lord Fairfax was proprietor, embracing what are now more than 20 Virginia and West Virginia counties. He was one of the justices, and on his appearance he was noted at the head of the list as the presiding justice. On the occasions when he and Washington happened to be on the bench together it may be imagined that he was glad to see with his own eyes how constantly there was being verified his prediction quoted at the outset that Washington "would go to school all his life and profit thereby."

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, just as an indication of how widespread the interest in Washington this year has been, I am in receipt of a letter from Uruguay, from a personal friend of mine, who happens to be sojourning in the capital of that far-away country. I want to read one paragraph from that letter:

> It is really touching the way people here feel about George Washington. They seem to regard him as the first great hero of the Americas and to feel that he belongs partly to them.

I also have a letter from Venezuela that runs in like vein. In other words, it seems to me that recognition of the character of Washington is more widespread throughout the world than that of any other character who ever lived.

I want to make this remark with no reference to any comparison in which invidious references have been made this morning, all of which will be properly appraised because they carry their own condemnation.

PROPOSED PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter quoting a resolution favoring the granting of immediate independence to the Philippine Islands, adopted by the convention of municipal presidents of Pangasinan, P. I., received by the

[1] His will, prepared a short time before his death, consisting of more than 20 large pages, wholly in his own handwriting, now preserved in the Record office at Fairfax and disposing of the largest estate of that time, tends to show his reliance upon the knowledge of law which he had acquired. Toward the end he modestly says it would be evident "that no professional character has been consulted or has had any agency in drafting the will."

THE FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I think no bureau in the Government has been of greater service than the Federal Trade Commission; yet there seems to be a movement and an effort to cripple it, to destroy its usefulness, by cutting down its appropriation.

I have here an editorial on this question from the Portland (Me.) Evening News, which I ask to have inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

[From the Portland (Me.) Evening News of Tuesday, March 1, 1932]

HANDS OFF THE FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION

Following its general policy, the Budget Bureau has cut $390,000 from the appropriation to the Federal Trade Commission for next year. The commission's estimate was for $1,626,000; the Budget Bureau's, $1,236,000. Under this decreased appropriation the Federal Trade Commission would be forced to discharge 184 of its 528 employees—a decrease of 35 per cent in personnel.

Furthermore, because the United States Senate enlarged the scope of the commission's activities by directing an additional investigation—into the building trades and cement industries—without making additional appropriation, and called for completion of the work by December, 1931, a deficit last year of $70,000 was incurred. The Budget Bureau refused to consider this deficit as warranting supplementary appropriation; hence it must be either paid for out of next year's appropriation—equivalent to a further 5 per cent reduction in the commission's efficiency—or else the commission must dismiss 75 employees March 1.

The Federal Trade Commission has been engaged in important investigations into public utilities, chain stores, and the cottonseed, cement, and building-materials industries. In addition, there are before Congress the Nye bills setting up a Federal trade court to make trade-practice agreements judicially enforceable under the Sherman and other antitrust acts dealing with restraints of trade, monopolies, and unfair competition.

To do this, and to continue its investigation of public utilities and other industries, the Federal Trade Commission needs more funds, not less. It would be nothing but calamitous were the commission forced to retrench at this time, when the fruit of its labors is so near at hand. It would be but the silliest kind of prodigality to dissipate because of any misguided motives of economy the results of three years' investigation, particularly when at some time this investigation will have to be started over again and the same expensive marshaling of fact and figure, the same careful scrutiny of ledger and statement, again undertaken.

Economy is and should be the watchword of Congress.

But under the guise of economy certain powerful corporate interests, those who operate effectively through lobbies, will work enthusiastically to cripple investigations which expose their less savory practices. These investigations have never been more important than in this crisis. For almost alone they point to many of the grave abuses which have precipitated the present depression and must be cured if we are to emerge from disaster and profit by its lessons.

A very large part of the present trouble may be traced to frenzied finance—reckless inflation, pyramiding holding companies, abuses which have resulted in losses of untold millions of dollars to American investors—of which the full tale is by no means as yet told. The Federal Trade Commission's investigation of the electric utilities has disclosed an almost incredible attempt to pervert public opinion to private gain, a story of greed and plunder in which the consumer's money was used so that he might continue to be exploited as he has been.

In short, the Federal Trade Commission, operating dispassionately, has nevertheless proved the bulwark of the people against exploitation. At least it furnishes the facts upon which those Congressmen and Senators who serve the people and not the vested interests may act. The commission's work should be facilitated and amplified rather than restricted and hindered by Budget curtailment. Considerable talk has been heard lately that we should not even in times of depression curtail our Budget for "defense." But who is the enemy to-day? The enemy is depression within, and the forces and errors that have brought it about. To combat that we certainly should not cut down our appropriation for "defense," but, if anything, increase it. And the Federal Trade Commission has in recent years proved itself to be the first line of defense.

SHORT SELLING

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I present a brief editorial from the News-Telegraph, of Sharon, Pa., in its issue of Monday, February 29, 1932, which I ask may be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

[From the News-Telegraph, of Sharon, Pa., Monday, February 29, 1932]

Both branches of Congress are interested in possible legislation looking toward abolishing the practice of stock-market speculators in "selling short," but members of the committees considering this say they are in a quandary as to the means whereby the vicious practice could be stopped. To the noncongressional mind the answer appears easy.

Make it a criminal offense for anyone to sell anything he does not own. That would instantly stop "short" sales. Brokers defend the infamous practice on the pretense that it "cushions" the market, but to hundreds of thousands of investors who have seen the value of their holdings steadily declining for more than two years past, largely because of "short" sales; no evidence of any cushioning has been apparent.

It is a criminal offense for anyone to circulate rumors likely to affect any bank unfavorably. It should likewise be illegal for any person to engage in a practice that so disastrously affects the value or values in other forms.

Speculators who sell "short" expect to be able to buy such stocks later at a lesser price. Accordingly they are extremely interested in doing everything possible to depress the price of stocks in order that they can grab a profit by buying many points below where they "sold short."

Brokers allege that had "short sales" been barred after the 1929 crash it would have been necessary to close the stock exchange because of a lack of business. That would have been a good thing. Had the stock exchange been closed two years ago the depression might have been over by this time. At least, security prices would not have been driven down by financial wolves who circulated any rumors they could concoct to lessen public confidence.

Congress should make it a prison offense for any person to sell something he does not own. That would effectively end "short" sales.

FEDERAL FARM BOARD AND GRAIN EXCHANGE

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. I should like to know the status of the resolution to investigate the Farm Board and also the grain exchange.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the first resolution, offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], was reported favorably. That resolution is now before the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. Subsequently the Senator from Nebraska introduced another resolution, which is before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and will be considered as soon as he can attend a meeting of the committee some day next week.

Mr. WHEELER. I simply desire to say, Mr. President, that unless the resolution is reported out of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate in the very near future, I shall move to discharge the committee from its consideration. As I understand, the committee has held up the resolution for nearly a month, and has not reported it.

Mr. McNARY. Let me disabuse the Senator's mind of that impression. I personally am responsible for the action of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. I have held up the matter because the Senator from Nebraska has changed his resolution, which contemplates that there shall be an investigation jointly by the Senate and House. I requested the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND], to withhold action until we decided under which resolution we wanted to proceed. So the responsibility is all my own; and if there is any censure due, it should be visited upon the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. WHEELER. I did not so understand the situation. I am very thankful for the explanation, but I wish to see action upon the resolution.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. FESS. The practice of that committee has always been that if a Senator has introduced a resolution, we do not act upon it until we have the author of the resolution before us, if there is any opposition at all. That is why the resolution has never come up.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, Senate bill 3477, for the relief of the Playa de Flor Land & Improvement Co., was referred to the Committee on Claims. I have spoken to the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL], and he says he has no objection to my asking that it be referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals. I therefore make that request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Committee on Claims will be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it will be referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

ANNUAL REPORTS OF DISTRICT PUBLIC-UTILITY COMPANIES (S. DOC. NO. 66)

On motion of Mr. CAPPER, it was Ordered, That the annual reports of the following-named public-utility companies in the District of Columbia, for the year ended December 31, 1931, heretofore transmitted to the Senate, be printed as a Senate document: Capital Traction Co., Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co., Georgetown Barge, Dock, Elevator & Railway Co., Georgetown Gas Light Co., Potomac Electric Power Co., Washington Gas Light Co., Washington Interurban Railroad Co., and Washington Railway & Electric Co.

RECOMMITTAL OF A BILL

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. There is on the calendar a bill reported by me from the Finance Committee adversely, which I ask to have recommitted to the Finance Committee for further consideration. I refer to Order of Business No. 354, being the bill (S. 2324) to extend the time for allowing suits on insurance contracts under section 19 of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended, the bill having been introduced by the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. MCGILL].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill is recommitted to the Committee on Finance.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The VICE PRESIDENT, as in executive session, laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting nominations, a withdrawal of a nomination, and a convention, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, and withdrawal of a nomination, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7912) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may I inquire what point has been reached in the progress of the pending agricultural appropriation bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no amendment pending. The bill is before the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. The committee amendments have all been acted upon?

Mr. McNARY. Yes; they have all been disposed of.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I send to the desk an amendment, which I ask to have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield for that purpose?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from Colorado offers the following amendment:

On page 48, line 21, to strike out the figures "$528,980" and insert in lieu thereof "$534,280."

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, the cut of $5,300 made by the House of Representatives from the Budget and restored by the amendment for conference consideration would eliminate the work done at the Rocky Mountain Experiment Station at Colorado Springs, Colo. The annual allotment for this work is $5,300. If this amount is restored, the work will continue on the same basis as in the past.

The work of this station began in 1906 and it has operated continuously until now. The work of the station is not limited to Colorado. It covers the forest regions of Colorado, Wyoming, and parts of Nebraska and South Dakota.

During its existence the station has shown its usefulness in many ways. It has studied the influence of windbreaks on agricultural crops in the Great Plains section, and a farmers' bulletin produced in 1910 has been issued to the extent of about 150,000 copies, the demand continuing regularly and without any stimulation. Other publications have dealt with the growth and management of the Engelmann spruce forest of Colorado, the production of lodge-pole pine, and the growth of valuable western yellow pine and Douglas fir.

I am credibly advised that much of the success obtained by the Forest Service in planting in Nebraska may justly be attributed to research carried on by this station.

The station has operated on about the same basis since its inception and, in fact, instead of being restricted the work already done merits the establishment of a full-fledged experiment station adequate to handle the problems of forest production, forest protection, range management, erosion, and stream flow affecting the specified regions.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I understand from the statement of the very able Senator from Colorado that this amendment simply adds $5,300 to the amount carried by the bill so as to equal the estimate of the Director of the Budget.

Mr. COSTIGAN. That is correct.

Mr. McNARY. I have no objection to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 65, line 16, after the word "employed," insert the following proviso:

Provided, That hereafter in the administration of the Federal highway act and acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto the first paragraph of section 9 of the act of November 9, 1921, shall not apply to publicly owned toll bridges or approaches thereto, constructed and operated by the highway department of any State.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, this bill contains a number of items to which I desire to call especial attention before the measure is finally voted upon. Before referring to the particular items, however, I desire just for a moment to review the way in which appropriation bills are passed in the Congress.

The Director of the Budget prepares a bill, say, like the agricultural appropriation bill. It is approved by the President. It is sent down to the House of Representatives and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, which, in turn, refers it to the subcommittee on the agricultural appropriation bill. All the items that have theretofore appeared in the bill—generally speaking, of course, because occasionally there are exceptions to the rule—are included in the bill. If there has been an authorization, say, in 1862, or in 1880, or in 1890, or in 1930, the matter appears in order in the bill. In other words, if a bureau was once established in the Department of Agriculture, it is continued year after year and year after year.

The agricultural subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations takes the bill and considers it for amendments. The great body of the bill is taken just as a matter of course as sent down by the Budget Director and the President. When the agricultural subcommittee reports the bill the amendments that are made, either striking out or adding to the bill of the previous year, are put in italics; and the bill is thus passed and sent to the Senate.

When the bill reaches the Senate it is referred to the Appropriations Committee of the Senate, and by that committee is referred to the agricultural subcommittee. When the subcommittee goes over the bill as it came from the House all the regular appropriations, the year-to-year appropriations, those previously authorized, are taken simply as a matter of course; and the subcommittee merely reports amendments that it recommends, adding items to the bill or striking out items found in it. The report of the subcommittee comes to the full committee, and the bill takes the same course there and is reported to the Senate. The Senate committee's addition or subtractions are put in italics; and that is the way this bill has reached here.

Mr. President, a number of items to which I wish to call attention to-day are items that have appeared in the bill year after year during all these years. They do not receive consideration at the hands of the committee; and, as a matter of fact, there is a reason for it, because there are so many of them that it is almost impossible to go over all of them.

I have before me, however, 29 items in the bill, calling for the expenditure of very large sums of money, as to which the reasons for the appropriations have long since passed. There is really but one reason for keeping them there, and that is because a bureau has been established. In other words, each one of the 29 amendments I am proposing has to do with a bureau here in Washington or sometimes outside of Washington—some of the duties of the bureau are outside of Washington, but for the most part they are here in Washington—that has just gone on, year by year, without ever receiving any consideration at all; and that is the way these appropriation bills are framed.

The first of these items of long standing to which I desire to call attention, found on page 80 of the bill, is our old friend the European corn borer. In the year 1919 somebody in Massachusetts found that there were some worms in the sweet corn that grows in that State, and he got the late Senator Lodge, if I remember correctly, to introduce a bill authorizing an appropriation of $10,000 that year to examine, investigate, and if possible eradicate the European corn borer. As I say, it was a bug or worm that existed in sweet corn.

Since that time the corn borer, so the documents say, has increased, has spread, but as rapidly as the corn borer spread it did not spread half as rapidly as this bureau created in Washington. I find that the Budget officer and the President have recommended for this year an appropriation of $795,000—by the way, an increase of $45,000 over the appropriation of last year—to help eradicate the corn borer.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. I ask the Senator whether he has investigated and knows how that money was spent last year and the year before?

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will be just a little patient with me, I think I can tell him the situation.

Mr. BROOKHART. I heard a comment that it was largely spent for tractors of the International Harvester Co. and things like that.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator that it was spent under the supervision of bureaus here in Washington, which had $750,000. The President has recommended that it be increased to $795,000. What did they do in 1919, when the $10,000 was first appropriated for Massachusetts? The first thing that was done was to establish a bureau here in Washington. The next year they wanted a very much larger appropriation, because they wanted to expand the bureau. They did prepare a bulletin, a very elaborate bulletin, on the European corn borer, and it is a very proper document, and ought to be very helpful to the farmers, because I suppose there is a corn borer somewhere, notwithstanding the fact that we made more corn last year than we ever made before, and the price is down to 23 cents a bushel. Yet we are asked to spend $795,000 this year, during this state of depression, with men hungry in the United States, largely for a bureau here in Washington, to help eradicate the European corn borer.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, right along that line, I was out through Ohio last summer, at a farm experimental school there, and the head of it told me that he had been out several days in the county where his school was located looking for corn borers, where they had been prevalent, and he had succeeded in finding three.

Mr. McKELLAR. I see one of the Senators from Florida here. I believe the corn borer bureau in the department has been very much more successful than the Mediterranean fruit fly bureau has been. The corn borer bureau, this bureau which costs from three-quarters of a million to a million dollars a year, has found several corn borers; in other words, they have found several worms in growing corn. Every man who ever lived on a farm knows that there never was a field of corn in which occasionally you did not find a worm. But they did not find many of these borers; at that, however, they found more corn borers than the other bureau found Mediterranean fruit flies. We spent some $7,000,000 to find the Mediterranean fruit fly, and no man in the United States has ever seen one alive, I am reliably informed.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. KING. I want to state to the Senator from Tennessee that last evening, in conversation with Hon. HAMILTON FISH, Representative from New York, he stated that last summer, when he was in Canada, he received telegraphic news that 96 men had been sent by the Department of Agriculture into his congressional district alone to hunt for corn borers, and they were kept there all summer. There was not a single corn borer, he said, in his district; none could be found; but those men were getting large compensation and all their expenses paid, 96 of them, and that organization was fostered by the Department of Agriculture. That is merely one illustration of the incompetency, the inefficiency, the extravagance, the waste—I was about to say the criminal waste—of the Department of Agriculture and a lot of those so-called specialists and doctors who infest it and to-day infest the country.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, it is not important, but I want to have the RECORD show that the amount of money available for the year 1932 is $950,000, and the action of the House committee and the Senate committee brought the sum down to $295,000, a reduction of $650,000 for the fiscal year 1933.

Mr. McKELLAR. That has been done since the bill has been sent here?

Mr. McNARY. This cut was made by the House of Representatives and that action sustained by the Senate Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am glad to hear it. I am glad to know that the committees have cut it down. The objection I have is that the committees ought to have found out what it would take to send this bulletin to a farmer, a bulletin which has already been printed, and they ought to have limited any appropriation simply to a few dollars for the distribution of this very valuable bulletin if, perchance, any corn borers can be found worthy of the name.

I want to call attention to this pamphlet. The Budget officer and the department and the President sent an authorization here of $795,000 for the eradication of the corn borer this year, and I call attention to this in the pamphlet:

> Thus far investigations have shown conclusively that the total eradication of the European corn borer in this country is beyond the realm of possibility.

Mr. President, I want to read just this from the pamphlet:

> Thus far investigations have shown conclusively that the total eradication of the European corn borer in this country is beyond the realm of possibility. It has been found feasible, nevertheless, to reduce the numbers of the borers in any given area to such an extent, by improved farm clean-up methods and other cultural practices, that the damage by the insect will be kept below the point of serious commercial loss.
> HISTORY OF THE CORN BORER IN THE UNITED STATES
> When the European corn borer was reported and identified in 1917 it was found to be causing severe damage to sweet corn in the vicinity of Boston, Mass., and to be present within an area of at least 100 square miles in that section.

There may have been a few corn borers. There is no place in the country where corn is grown where some insect will not be found occasionally in an ear of corn, as we all know. But just look at the establishment there is to look after the corn borer. The first salary is $6,400 a year to look after the European corn borer. The next one is $4,600. The third one is $4,200. The fourth one is $4,800. The fifth one is $4,600. The next one is $3,800. The next one is $3,450. The next is $3,200. The next is $3,700. The next is $2,900, then $2,700, and on down to $1,500. In other words, there is a bureau employing 92 men, year after year, trying to eradicate the European corn borer, when there have been very few corn borers ever seen or identified in this country.

I am happy the committees have reduced this appropriation; it ought to be stricken out altogether.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. KING. Will not the Senator call attention to the large appropriation which was secured a year or two ago, as I recall, from fourteen to seventeen million, for the extermination of the corn borer, most of which was used in one or two States, and paid to the farmers for pulling down or burning their own corn after the corn had been removed from the stalks?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, a large part of the money that has been spent for the eradication of the corn borer has been spent for damages done to growing crops. The corn borer has not done half the damage this bureau and its agents have done, and it ought to be abolished. That is what I propose here in an amendment, to abolish this bureau entirely, and strike out the appropriation. Here is a pest which the department says can not be eradicated. This bulletin says it can not be eradicated. Yet we find that they are spending this vast sum.

I come next to another item in this bill, not an amendment, just one of those items which go along year by year, the appropriation for controlling the Japanese and Asiatic beetle. We spent last year $445,000 for the control and the prevention of the Japanese beetle. By the way, there are two separate bureaus working on the Japanese and Asiatic beetle, not one expensive bureau but two expensive bureaus working on that item.

The Japanese beetle was discovered in the State of New Jersey in 1916. Two years later we began appropriating for its control. They discovered a bug somewhere, and immediately applied for an authorization from Congress. That was $10,000 or $20,000—infinitesimal—but the next year it was double that amount, and it just continues to double and double, until we are now spending $445,000 for the control and prevention of the spread of the Japanese beetle; and the President and the Budget Director, the economists, recommend but $400,000 this year to do away with these little bugs which are found in yards, and ought to be cleaned up by the people who own the yards.

There is a bulletin about that, and the bulletin says that, in 1916, when there was no appropriation, only a few beetles could be collected. In 1919, after an appropriation was received, there were as many as fifteen or twenty thousand beetles collected up in one little area in New Jersey, as I remember. It seems that these beetles eat a great many kinds of trees, both fruit and shade, and it is claimed they injure the trees.

The department has published a pamphlet of 67 pages on this beetle. Of course it is very interesting, and after reading it it is difficult to believe that this pest has destroyed property to the extent of one-tenth of the appropriation.

Senators will not believe it when I say to them that the records show that the American Government in the last 10 years has spent $4,152,212 in the so-called attempt to eradicate a beetle which is named, for the purpose of making the bureau seem important, the Japanese and Asiatic beetle.

Nearly all of this $400,000 we are asked to appropriate in this bill for the control of the Japanese and Asiatic beetle is to be spent right here in Washington, paying a great number of clerks in a bureau for that purpose. By the way, there are two bureaus, not one, but two separate bureaus for the control of the Asiatic and Japanese beetle. So much for that.

Now I come to an item which President Wilson used to say was of greater importance and nearer consequence.

I come now to the pink bollworm which has to do with my part of the country. The Congress appropriated last year $497,000, and this year the President cut it down to $436,000.

The Government has prepared a most interesting bulletin on the pink bollworm. Like the other two pests, it is claimed that he came from foreign countries. This one came from Asia. However, from the list of places where he now ranges, the world seems to be his stamping ground. A full description of the pink bollworm is given. Full advice is given in this bulletin as to how the cotton farmers can combat him.

It will be remembered that several years ago the pink bollworm destroyed enormous amounts of cotton in the extreme Southern States. It got up as high as northern Mississippi, and then the pink bollworm seems to have quit his operations and for a number of years has not greatly injured the cotton crop. Whatever the Government could do to combat this pest it has done except to send out the pamphlets; and yet we find, out of this appropriation of $436,000, that $314,720 is for personal services.

It is merely the institution of a bureau and that bureau will stay with us. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], a very young man, may be here 50 years more, and if he is here 50 years from now he will hear read year after year appropriations for the control of the pink bollworm and the European corn borer, because once established as a bureau in the department, that bureau goes on forever. I will later refer to a bureau that was established as far back as 1862 and is still in existence and still operating, though the reason for it has long since passed away. The only reason for its existence now is to pay the employees of the bureau their salaries.

Salaries of $4,000 and $5,000 and some of nearly $6,000 are paid to employees of the bureau to combat the pink bollworm that has not infested any part of the cotton crop of the South since at least 1924. Since 1917 we have spent the enormous sum of $6,833,580 on the pink bollworm and the end is not yet, because we propose to appropriate $400,000 for it this year. Yet we made more cotton last year than ever before in our history. I think the President or one of his Cabinet officers recommended that we plow up every third row of cotton in order to better the price of cotton, and yet we are spending this money on bugs that no longer exist; and the Government, by the expenditure of this money, could not prevent their existence under any circumstances. The only thing the appropriation does is to enable the bureau to send out its bulletins to the farmers. They would be helpful if the test should occur again, but the only purpose now is to keep the bureau in existence and going along with this willful waste of the people's money.

Incidentally, before leaving the pink bollworm, I find on page 134 of the Budget another appropriation of $276,820 for insects affecting cotton, including research on the pink bollworm of cotton, and another large bureau where the personal services amount to $190,200. These two bureaus might at least be coordinated and consolidated; and, inasmuch as the President has recommended the consolidation of bureaus, I believe I will call his attention especially to these two bureaus, both looking after the bollworm that has left our part of the country, at any rate.

On page 95 of the Budget I find another bureau for cotton, for investigation and control of diseases. Whether this includes the bollworm I do not know; but, at any rate, the appropriation for that is $221,040, of which $180,184 is spent for personal services. That is just the building up of another bureau.

Now I come to one of the most peculiar of all of these matters that I have been investigating. It is called the "phony peach disease," and the appropriation is made for the eradication of that disease. They have a bulletin on that disease. But I have learned that "phony" is not the proper term for it. I want to call this to the special attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES]. The appropriation bill says it is for the "phony peach disease." The bulletin issued by the bureau says "pony peach disease." What do you suppose, Mr. President, this money has been used for year after year? It is a most remarkable thing. Let me tell you about it. Some man went into a peach orchard down in Georgia. He found there some trees smaller than others. He called the smaller trees "pony" trees. He conceived the idea that all peach trees in a peach orchard ought to be of the same size. He said the fruit on the "pony" trees was not quite so good as the fruit on the larger trees. Therefore, he became instrumental in getting an appropriation from Congress which was authorized several years ago, and when it was authorized what happened?

The bureau sent one of these highly paid experts down to Georgia and he destroyed the "pony" peach trees. Think of that for a moment! Here is a peach orchard with several small trees in it. The trees are not uniform in size, said the bulletin, so they ought to be made uniform. I suppose on that theory we ought to organize a bureau to make men all the same size. What a splendid idea it would be to have another bureau, a bureau to investigate the causes for the differences in the height and size of men and of women, and to determine whether they could not be made uniform and equal. Would not that be a beautiful thought? Would not that be a beautiful use to which to put the Government's money?

Yet that is what we are doing in the case of the "pony" peach disease. The bureau is breaking up the little trees in an effort to make the trees all uniform in size. While the amount is not large, yet this year there is a recommendation for an appropriation of $82,000. It is just that much money of the people that is thrown away. The bureau can not make fruit trees all the same size any more than it could make men or animals all the same size. It is ridiculous to undertake it, and yet we are spending about $100,000 a year in an effort to make fruit trees of the same size and strength—certainly a ridiculous proposition.

I next come to our old friend the Mediterranean fruit fly. I heard of a very funny thing that happened with reference to that. We have appropriated $6,000,000 or $7,000,000 up to this time for the eradication of the Mediterranean fruit fly. The Mediterranean fruit fly was discovered in the fruit warfare between California and Florida several years ago. We have spent already over $7,000,000 to eradicate the Mediterranean fruit fly. There is not a man alive, so the bulletin says, who has ever seen in this country a live Mediterranean fruit fly. The bureau found a dead one one time, and they have him in a glass case in the bureau. There may be several that they claim are Mediterranean fruit flies, but so far as that is concerned it has never been seen alive in this country. The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] will remember, and other Senators will remember, that several years ago we authorized in one year, I think, $6,000,000 for the eradication of this great pest. What was done with it? I am going to tell a story on a friend of mine, without mentioning his name, that indicates how the money was spent in Florida.

This friend of mine drove down to Florida several years ago when this enormous appropriation was made. When he got across the Georgia line going into Jacksonville, Fla., he was stopped by a man who was driving a fine automobile. He was overhauled by this man and his car stopped. This agent came up to him and said, "I want to examine your automobile." It happened that my friend had a bottle of liquor in his automobile, and he at first suspected that it was a prohibition officer hunting for liquor, so he said, "Have you a warrant?" The man said, "Oh, I do not need a warrant." My friend said, "You will have to have a warrant to search my automobile." The man said, "I don't suppose you have one anyhow." My friend knew that he did have a bottle of liquor in his automobile and he said, "Whether I have it or not, I do not want you to investigate and search my car." The man said, "My friend, I am afraid you do not understand. I want to investigate to see whether you have a Mediterranean fruit fly in your automobile." When my friend found that was all he wanted, he let him go ahead with his investigation.

I have forgotten the exact number of times, but, as I recollect, that traveling friend of mine in Florida going down down the east coast as far as Miami was held up and his automobile examined 17 times for the purpose of seeing whether he had a Mediterranean fruit fly, which he had never seen and which no one else had ever seen. That is the way the Government is spending its money.

In 1924 or 1925 we appropriated so much money for the eradication of the Mediterranean fruit fly that had never existed that most of the appropriations are still left on hand and we are still reappropriating the unexpended balances of the fund for its eradication. We ought not to do that. We ought to let the money be returned to the Treasury.

Another way our money was spent was in the destruction of many orchards. Occasionally some worm was found in an orange, as a worm may be found in any orange grove anywhere in the world. There is always some fruit of any kind that has a worm in it. The agents of the Government went down there and plowed up and grubbed up whole orange groves. As I understand it, the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] offered an amendment to the Agricultural Department appropriation bill to require the Government to compensate Florida orange-grove owners for the losses sustained in having their orange groves grubbed up in attempting to find a Mediterranean fruit fly. May I ask the Senator in charge of the bill whether that amendment was agreed to?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the amendment was rejected by the vote of the Senate on yesterday.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thank the Senator. We spent $7,000,000 in attempting to eradicate a fly that no one has ever seen, and then, after our agents went down there and destroyed great orange groves, the grove owners come and want the Federal Government to pay for their losses. Sooner or later—and it is just a question of time—the Federal Government will have to pay for every one of those orange groves that this bureau destroyed. Some were destroyed by poison, others by grubbing them up, and others in other ways. That is what we are getting into by making these appropriations year after year. I doubt if the appropriations to which I have referred were even brought to the attention of the Senate by having the items read. I am not blaming anyone for that. We are just continuing to keep these bureaus in existence as a matter of form. I think the chief of this bureau got something like $8,000, and they are keeping the same old bureau going now under another name. So much for the Mediterranean fruit fly.

The next item I want to discuss is the white-pine blister rust. The estimate of the President for white-pine blister rust this year was $469,997. We have spent on white-pine blister rust since 1916—the bureau was established that year—$5,186,175.

What is white-pine blister rust? A bulletin has been issued on it. The Government has ascertained what it is. white-pine blister rust is a little insect that first forms on the bark of the white pine tree as a little worm. It develops into a moth or fly and then flies to a currant bush. That is what the bulletin says. The moth when it becomes a moth flies to a currant bush nearby the white-pine forest. There it lays its eggs on the currant bush; then the eggs become worms; then they become moths or flies again, and they fly back, and when they get back to the white-pine trees they are more vigorous than they previously were. The bud of the currant bushes or the sap of the currant bushes seems to strengthen their boring qualities, and they bore through the pine a little bit. I do not know to what extent they may bore into the pine tree. The Senator from Idaho possibly can tell me, as he lives in a pine-tree country. However, the Government has found out just exactly what white-pine blister rust is. A bulletin has been sent out, and that is all the Government can do. The Government can not go there and prevent those moths from flying first to the currant bush and then back to the pine tree; it is impossible to do it. All we have to appropriate for is the bulletin, to enable it to be sent out to the pine-tree owners, so that they may know how to take care of the pest.

It is true that the high-priced technical men in the bureau have dug up some 15,000 currant bushes. I do not know whether we will have to pay for the currant bushes after they are dug up or not. I imagine that those who own the currant bushes will follow suit of the orange growers in Florida and come back here with a bill asking the Government to pay for the destruction of the currant bushes on which the moth laid the eggs. So that is white-pine blister rust on which under this bill we are going to spend $469,997 and on which we have already spent $5,168,175. Think of it! With over 8,000,000 people unemployed in this country and hundreds of thousands of people hungry, the Government is spending its money—millions of dollars—on white-pine blister rust, keeping a big bureau in operation here, with highly paid officials doing ostensibly a work that it is impossible for them to do, because they admit that all they can do is to tell the owners of the white-pine forests what they should do to save them. This bureau has been in existence since 1916.

I next come to an amendment to which I desire to refer. I presume it has already been agreed to. May I ask the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY], if he will be kind enough to tell me whether the amendment providing an appropriation of $1,450,000 for grasshopper eradication was agreed to?

Mr. McNARY. That was agreed to day before yesterday.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is already agreed to, but I think I ought to have a word or two to say about it. I have bulletins here on the subject. The department has already prepared the bulletins and sent them out. I have a bulletin on each one of these items. The bulletin as to grasshoppers says that no human being can tell ahead of time whether there is going to be a plague of grasshoppers sweep over the country. There are places in the West, in Kansas, Nebraska, and other States, that are sometimes afflicted with grasshopper plagues, but no man can tell six months ahead whether the grasshoppers will appear; and yet there is appropriated in this bill the enormous sum of $1,450,000 to enable the Government to investigate whether there is going to be a grasshopper plague this spring in certain States.

If there should be such a plague, will the appropriation of $1,450,000 save the people in the areas affected from this pest? Not at all. They can not find anything out about grasshoppers except what they know, the appropriation of $1,450,000 will not save them, but it will be very good to have such an amount of money expended in States of the West. A very large number of men can be sent out with $1,450,000 hunting grasshoppers during the spring, and this is a fine time to send them out. They may need the jobs very badly. Who can tell?

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. NORBECK. If the Senator will look at the appropriation item he will find the money can not be used for that purpose.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will turn to it he will see for what purposes the appropriation is to be used. The Senator's State is one of the States affected, his State is one of the States that occasionally has a grasshopper plague, and such plagues are bad; we all know that to be so; but the Government has already told exactly what to do when a grasshopper plague comes. If every dollar of this appropriation were spent in South Dakota it would not keep South Dakota from having a grasshopper plague if one should come; and the Senator does not know, and no other human being knows, whether or not there is going to be a grasshopper plague during the coming spring or summer. Yet here is an appropriation proposed in the Senate, and put on this bill in the Senate, providing $1,450,000 to eradicate grasshoppers that do not now exist and that no human being can tell whether they will ever exist. I am just wondering about it.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. NORBECK. If the Senator will read the Budget Bureau report, he will find their estimate was that to do a good job it would take $3,000,000, of which the Government proposes to furnish half. In other words, the money provided by the Government must, in effect, be matched by the people in the respective localities, by the States, or by the counties before it shall become available. So there has got to be a very deep interest and a willingness on the part of the people in any locality to take hold of it or none of the Federal money will be available to them.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to ask has the Senator any inside information as to whether there is going to be a plague of grasshoppers this year?

Mr. NORBECK. The only information I have is outside information.

Mr. McKELLAR. What sort of information—just so it is information, I should like to have it—what kind of information has the Senator that there is going to be a grasshopper plague in South Dakota this year?

Mr. NORBECK. Large areas have been infested; the eggs have been deposited; and during the farm spell they are beginning to hatch.

Mr. McKELLAR. That happens every year, does it not?

Mr. NORBECK. No; the Senator is mistaken about grasshoppers. He must keep in mind that it is a problem in itself that has got to be studied carefully.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am speaking from the record. I will get the grasshopper bulletin in just a moment. We have spent millions already to exterminate grasshoppers. I will look up the exact amount. I have a bulletin here, which I will find in a moment. Here it is—Grasshopper Control. That is one bulletin; I have another one which is entitled "A Study of the Lesser Migratory Grasshoppers." Listen to the way this very costly bulletin begins:

A survey of the publications—

Not a survey of grasshoppers, but—

A survey of the publications relating to grasshoppers has shown the need of a more detailed study of the life history and habits of these insects.

I will digress here long enough to say that there is an appropriation—quite a large appropriation, though not as large as the grasshopper appropriation—for the study of the marital relations of microscopic insects. I will call the Senator's attention to it a little later on. But this bulletin says:

A survey of the publications relating to grasshoppers has shown the need of a more detailed study of the life history and habits of these insects. Most of the existing literature deals with the subject of taxonomy and control.

Taxonomy, as the Senator no doubt knows—I did not know it until I looked it up—means the habits, relations, virtues and lack of virtues, correlations, and propagation of infinitesimal microscopic insects. They are related to the grasshopper because it seems that the grasshoppers in the evolutionary stage are microscopic insects, and it may be the Senator has some information that these microscopic insects are going to get bigger this year and become grasshoppers. I do not know; but here is all this literature about grasshoppers—A Study of the Lesser Migratory Grasshoppers.

I would be glad to show these bulletins to the Senator. In North Dakota and Montana there are sections where sometimes grasshoppers have been unusually widespread and destructive, but every way of dealing with grasshoppers is set out in these two bulletins.

If I were a farmer in the State of the Senator from South Dakota, the only possible way I could deal with grasshoppers, if they came, would not be to get the highly paid experts here in Washington to study the subject of taxonomy of grasshoppers, but I would have to follow the instructions contained in these bulletins and take such means of destroying the grasshoppers when they came as would be possible. The Government can not do that. We could spend every dollar of the $1,450,000 proposed to be appropriated under an amendment which has been agreed to for the eradication of grasshoppers; but no one would know whether they would come or not; no human being can tell whether they are coming; and if there was spent every dollar of the appropriation there will have to be just as big an appropriation next year if there should then be trouble about grasshoppers.

Mr. NORBECK. The Senator has forgotten that I told him they were already there; it is not a question of their coming.

Mr. McKELLAR. Was there any evidence before the committee that they were there? I never heard of that in the hearings before the committee. It may be they are there. If the Senator says that he has seen them, he has given us some information; if he has seen grasshoppers or has seen the bugs out of which the grasshoppers come, I take his word for it; but before the committee, prior to the time I left, there was not one scintilla of evidence except what is contained in this bulletin, and the bulletin says that no one can tell six months ahead or three months ahead whether or not there will be a grasshopper plague.

Mr. NORBECK. I call the Senator's attention to the Budget estimate that was submitted to the committee, and which is printed in the committee's report. That gives a good deal of information as to this particular subject.

I may say that a meeting was held at Sioux City last fall in which a half dozen Western States were represented to determine what to do with the question. Areas 100 miles across are completely devastated; there is not a cornstalk left; there is not a straw or grain left; the orchards have been destroyed; the ground has been infested with these eggs; and we know that the next crop of grasshoppers is almost here.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator mean to say that this appropriation of $1,450,000 and a like appropriation by the States affected would enable them to prevent the devastation of the crops by grasshoppers?

Mr. NORBECK. That is the opinion of those men who spent last summer studying the problem and who succeeded in exterminating them in certain areas. I myself am not a grasshopper expert; I can not qualify as such.

Mr. McKELLAR. I know nothing about it except what I find in the Government bulletins, and they state that no one can tell when there is going to be a plague of grasshoppers.

Mr. NORBECK. No; let me correct the Senator on that. They can not tell when the grasshoppers may come into new territory. The bulletin does not say that they can not tell whether the grasshoppers are going to come after they are there, and have laid their eggs.

Mr. McKELLAR. All right. Let us see where that takes us. We are going to appropriate $1,450,000 to prevent grasshoppers from despoiling certain portions of Nebraska and North Dakota and South Dakota.

Mr. NORBECK. Or, rather, from spreading to other States.

Mr. McKELLAR. From spreading to other States. It would be necessary to make an appropriation of at least three or four hundred thousand dollars in every other State so as to be certain that the grasshoppers did not cross the boundary lines.

Mr. KING. They ought to be branded.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; as the Senator from Utah says, they ought to be branded. We ought to appropriate enough money here to brand these grasshoppers and prevent their crossing State lines.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator was absent yesterday; otherwise, he would have still further exhibits to offer. He has not told half of the story.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; of course, I have not. The story of the grasshopper is a wonderful story.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Under the precedent it was sought to establish yesterday—and I am sorry to advise the Senator that the precedent was supported by practically all the Senators on his side—we are not only supposed to pay for killing the grasshoppers, but we are supposed to pay for the grasshoppers after we have killed them. That is the theory under which we are supposed to proceed.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am certainly very grateful to the Senator from Michigan for his enlightening statement. I was not here yesterday, I am sorry to say, or I would not have brought up the subject again.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I think the Senator from Michigan probably is referring to a little colloquy between himself and the Senator from Florida on yesterday, but he has not very accurately stated the situation.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am willing to have any light on the subject that I can get.

Mr. TRAMMELL. No one said that the Government would have to pay for killing the grasshoppers. I did state, in response to an inquiry of the Senator from Michigan, that if the Government agents displayed a total disregard for the interests of the farmers in that territory, and by inefficiency and by abuse of their rights ruthlessly destroyed the property of farmers, under the policy which has been established by the Government ordinarily they would expect some compensation; and, so far as I was concerned, I thought the compensation was all right.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not want to get into a controversy as between the western grasshopper and the Mediterranean fruit fly. I am afraid I would be ground between the upper and the nether millstones; so, if the Senators will permit me, I will go along.

The idea of appropriating $1,450,000 to protect us from an expected pest of grasshoppers, to my mind, is monstrous.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. In just one minute. We are already $2,000,000,000 in the hole on running expenses. We have already appropriated at this session $1,250,000,000 more. We are going to appropriate, for the running expenses of another year, $4,601,000,000. We now have an income of only $3,000,000,000, and do not expect an income next year of more than $4,000,000,000. Where in the world are we going to get the money? Men and women are starving in this country, and here we are spending $1,450,000 to ward off grasshoppers when no man on earth knows whether we are going to have them or not.

I now yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I have great sympathy with the Senator's position; but let me remind him that if this expected grasshopper plague does not materialize the money will not be spent.

Mr. McKELLAR. Suppose we should apply that theory to other matters. We may have an earthquake next year. How foolish it would be to appropriate $100,000,000 to erect homes for the people because an earthquake might come and shake down those that they now have! Yet this appropriation for grasshoppers, in my judgment, is just as futile and just as foolish. It is a willful waste of the people's money that ought not to be indulged in for a moment. I am very fond of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK]; but when this amendment goes to conference, I hope the conferees will strike it out.

I now come to another one. Listen to this. I do not know whether Senators know what it is or not. I did not before I looked it up. I am perfectly frank to say so.

The President has recommended that we appropriate this year, and we have just appropriated, $452,445 for the Parlatoria date scale. This, by the way, includes several other purposes. It includes Japanese and Asiatic beetles; and it takes $55,000 of the unexpended appropriation for the Mediterranean fruit fly and proposes to use it for another purpose.

Where is the Senator from Florida. This refers to the appropriation he secured some years ago to eradicate the Mediterranean fruit fly. Fifty-five thousand dollars of the unexpended balance of the appropriation for the Mediterranean fruit fly contained in the agricultural appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1931 is to be available until June 30, 1933, for what purpose? To do away with Parlatoria? Oh, no; for research work in the Hawaiian Islands!

Do you know what that means? The distinguished gentlemen of the bureau, drawing these perennial salaries from the Government for the purpose of dealing with Parlatoria, would like to have a little trip out to Hawaii; and if we appropriate this money, these distinguished gentlemen will go to Hawaii and make an investigation. They will look at those insects out there, and they may cross them and get us into all kinds of trouble.

You remember that the Commonwealth of Australia is suffering from a pest of rabbits—jack rabbits. You know how they got them. They got them by a mistake. They got them by interbreeding the rabbits of Australia, which were harmless, with rabbits from Texas or Arizona—I believe from Arizona, where they grow larger—and they formed the Australian jack rabbit, which has become one of the greatest pests of the world. I believe in Great Britain they have a little animal that has become a great pest there, that was brought about by the interbreeding of some pests in England and those in this country. So that is what we are likely to get into. We ought to keep these men at home and let them work on something that will be of real value. The idea of keeping a bureau here to examine into the habits of Parlatoria, or rust of dates! Perhaps these gentlemen need a vacation in Hawaii, and they may have it.

Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to this item. We are appropriating $452,445 for this bureau. How much of it is used for looking for Parlatoria or rust, a little, infinitesimal insect? Why, $399,700 out of the $452,000 is used for the pay of bureaucrats. That is what it is for. No wonder our Government is $2,000,000,000 in the hole when we allow these perennial bureaus to grow in this fashion. The first one that I have here was established in the year 1862, 70 years ago. Year by year they have been taking the people's money and getting larger all the time.

I next come to a very unusual thing—gypsy and brown-tail moths. I am sorry the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] is not here, because that is a moth that seems to be indigenous to New Jersey. We are told that it came from foreign countries. It is an aristocratic moth. It eats the grass on aristocratic lawns only. It must be a lawn that is cut with a mower. That is where they thrive best; and they sometimes eat up the grass there.

Mr. KEAN entered the Chamber.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from New Jersey has come in now, and I want to tell him about what is being done in his own State. I am quite sure the Senator is familiar with it. This bureau has antiquity about it. The bureau was established long before the distinguished Senator from New Jersey came to this body. It was established in the year 1907 to deal with the gypsy and brown-tail moths. Of course the Senator from New Jersey knows about them. He shakes his head, but I am sure he does know about them.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TYDINGS in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. KEAN. I think that is confined to Massachusetts.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then the bulletin is wrong, because the bulletin says "New Jersey."

Mr. KEAN. We have none in New Jersey. We have eliminated them.

Mr. McKELLAR. You have eliminated them? I am glad to hear they are eliminated.

Mr. KEAN. So am I.

Mr. McKELLAR. This bureau is like one of the oaks in the forest of bureaucracy. It was begun in 1907. The Government has spent to eliminate those little moths $11,781,769, and the Senator says they are eliminated. As a matter of fact, he has just as many moths there as there ever were. This money has been spent largely by bureaus here in Washington. It has just been going on from year to year. It started with a very small appropriation and had, perhaps, one or two people in the bureau. It has grown and grown and grown each year. Now it comes in as a matter of course. The department head recommends that a little more be given each year. It is not discussed in the Congress; and the result is that $11,781,769 has been spent on gypsy and brown-tail moths, largely in New Jersey, and the Senator say it does not exist there!

There is a fine bulletin on the subject. This moth does exist also in Massachusetts. There are a few there; or, rather, the bulletin says that a few have been seen there. The States have taken control of the matter and probably have eradicated it. The money is spent very largely down here in Washington.

I next come to a very insignificant amount appropriated for work in connection with the Mexican fruit worm. The total estimate for 1933 for the quarantine against the Mexican fruit worm is $123,580, of which $92,000 is for a bureau here. It has been growing year by year.

The people want to know where their money goes. There is where it goes—for building up these bureaus. By the way, there are 29 of these bureaus that I am talking about. Most of them I have already referred to, and I have three or four more to talk about. They have been growing up steadily since 1862. This is the year when the first one was started, and the last one was started in 1930. They are getting a little larger every year, coming in with the bills as a matter of course. Their work is done. They did all they could do when they investigated and published a bulletin. There is nothing else for them to do, and yet they go on.

Mr. President, we have spent this sum on the Mexican fruit worm, which has never come over. The Mexican fruit worm is not here. We have fruit worms of our own, but the Mexican fruit worm has not come.

I next come to the cotton-insect investigation. I have already talked about the bollworm. The cotton-insect investigation in another old friend. This bureau now is 28 years old. It was started in 1904. The President cut down this estimate somewhat, and he is to be commended for it. Last year the amount was $304,820. This year it is only $276,820, and the most of that is for personal services.

Cotton insects. The Government has spent in the last few years millions of dollars in the study of cotton insects. Yet the President some time ago recommended that every third row of cotton be plowed up so as to keep the farmers from producing too much. Such appropriations as these are a waste of the people's money, and should not be indulged in, and I think these amendments should be agreed to. The most that has been done by this bureau since 1907 has been the publication of a bulletin.

Now I come to another bureau, that having to do with insects affecting men and animals. I do not know exactly what insects they refer to. There are certain kinds of lice and bugs which bite both men and animals. The estimate sent down this year by the President was for $149,000. Of this, $110,000 is for the bureau represented. The salaries begin with $5,000 and go down. It is an ancient bureau; it has been in existence since 1913. I suppose this money is largely spent on fleas. Fleas, I believe, attack both men and animals; do they not? I know they attack men, because I have felt them. Here we are running $2,000,000,000 behind in the running expenses of the Government, borrowing money wherever we can borrow it to keep the Government going, with 8,000,000 men out of employment, with hundreds of thousands, perhaps, hungry at this very minute, and we are asked to spend $149,000, according to this recommendation of the President, on bugs which affect both men and animals, whatever they may be. It is just another means of creating a bureau. It is just another bureau kept running, another way of spending the people's money for easy, light work.

I next come to taxonomy. I did not know what taxonomy meant. That was a word that was never in my vocabulary; I never had occasion to use it. But I find it treats of the interrelations of insects, microscopic insects, their habits, their methods of reproduction, their marriage, their lives, and their fortunes.

Let me see how much we appropriate for that. We appropriate but $235,730 for taxonomy, on these microscopic insects, their marital relations and lives, their methods of reproduction. By the way, there is another subbureau. This bureau over here can allow immigrant microscopic insects to come into this country and be exchanged for like microscopic insects to go to foreign countries. In other words, they are mixing the breeds of these microscopic insects, at a cost of $235,000. That is very small, but here is a bureau which I think was started in 1910, and they are still studying the marriage relations and the methods of reproduction of these microscopic insects. They have not finished the study yet. This bureau has been in existence about 22 years, and it seems to me that they must finish their study before a great while. I want to read from the bill:

> For taxonomy and interrelations of insects, and including the importation and exchange of useful insects and an insect-pest survey, $234,930.

Nearly all of that goes for personal services. This bureau has been doing this work for 22 years, but, so far as I am able to see, they have not been able to prepare a bulletin to show the interrelations of these insects. They do not show how many they have imported, though they are directed by law to import them. Think of it! Think of our spending our money for the importation of microscopic insects at a time like this, with our Government in the situation in which it finds itself. It is a crying shame. The whole country is waiting, no doubt, on this bureau right now to know how many insects they are going to exchange the next year. Yet we do not have a report from the bureau. It has been in existence 22 years and there is no report yet.

What the people who are engaged in this work, and who have been engaged in it 22 years, have been doing I can not say. I suppose they have their agents in Asia and Europe and other countries trying to get proper insects so that they can bring them over here and interbreed them with our insects, and see if we can not get a better stock. To my mind, it is very reckless for these people to bring in insects which may be exceedingly dangerous to our country. Whether or not the European corn borer was brought in in that way, the record does not show. Whether or not the Asiatic beetle was brought in in that way, the record does not show. Whether or not the pink bollworm was brought in in that way, the record does not show. Whether or not the Mediterranean fruit fly was brought in in that way, the record does not show. I am merely pointing out to this bureau the dangers of taxonomy.

I call the attention of this bureau, if they would deign to listen to such an unimportant person as I am, to the fact that there may be danger in bringing these foreign insects here, just as there was danger in carrying rabbits to Australia and muskrats to Great Britain. I understand that the rabbits in Australia are a perfect pest, and that the muskrats in Great Britain are becoming a great pest. The European starling has become a great nuisance in this country since its introduction, and the authorities are at their wits' end to know how to deal with it. The mongoose, though useful in its native country of India, when taken to Jamaica, Porto Rico, Hawaii, and other places to destroy vermin, became very destructive to poultry, game, and various harmless native animals.

Let us be warned by what happened about the carp, a native of Asia. A standard authority says:

> Within a few years it has been introduced into America and widely distributed by the Government, but has proved a nuisance in many localities, destroying the natural growth of water plants and increasing to such an extent that other and more valuable fish can not exist. It is rapidly extending its range. In America it is not generally considered fit for food. (Webster's International Dictionary.)

No doubt the Government agents who distributed this fish in America were confident they were performing a useful service for the public. What actually happened shows that they were badly mistaken. Let our taxonomy specialists take warning from occurrences of this kind.

We are told by authorities on the subject that nature provides checks and balances on these animals and insects in their native countries, but that when they are taken to other lands the balance is upset, and they often increase beyond all reason and control. So I hope the bureau, which is importing what it regards as useful insects, will be exceedingly careful to see that those brought in will not prove a danger to this country.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I do not desire to differ with the object and purpose of the Senator; I think he is performing a splendid service to his country in directing attention to many of these abuses in the way of appropriations. But I am sure he wishes to confine himself to the facts.

Mr. McKELLAR. Indeed, I do.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I do not know of any $7,000,000 claim in regard to the Mediterranean fruit-fly damage at all. I think that statement is a little erroneous. Of course, we do not know what we may ask for in Florida.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to say to the Senator that I have a great deal of sympathy with his contention. I think that if the Government sends a lot of agents and has them patrolling the roads in Florida, holding up every passenger who comes along in an automobile or on horseback or in any other way to see whether that man has a Mediterranean fruit fly in his possession, and if those agents destroy orange groves without cause, if they poison the trees, if they cut down the trees, and there are no Mediterranean fruit flies, I am not so sure but what there are some equitable considerations which should lead the Government to make those orange-grove owners whole.

What I am complaining of are these useless appropriations, these useless and worse than useless bureaus which are being kept up here in the department. That is what I am complaining of.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I am thoroughly in sympathy with many of the criticisms being made by the Senator from Tennessee, but I did not want the RECORD to indicate that we were asking for $7,000,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. What was the amount?

Mr. TRAMMELL. There has been no amount ascertained. I do not think it would run over two or three million, but it has not been ascertained. That is the point; there is no definite amount ascertained.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am glad the Senator called my attention to it, because I do not want to do him or Florida an injustice.

I come to the next bureau, fruit and shade tree investigations. It was estimated by the President for this year, in these hard times, that $452,445 would be required to look after fruit and shade tree insects. We have enumerated nearly all the insects that are hurtful to fruit and shade trees. There are the Mediterranean fruit fly and the Mexican fruit worm. There is a difference between a worm and a fly. I think the fly comes a few days after the worm. There is the rust in Massachusetts and New Jersey, and other things. But here is another bureau, to cost $452,445, to look after fruit and shade tree insects. But our old friend the Japanese beetle and the Asiatic beetle needed a little more money, so this also included Japanese and Asiatic beetles.

We have a bureau for the specific purpose of looking after the Asiatic and Japanese beetles, but they come along and add this. There is another bureau looking after Parlatoria, and here comes along this general one, and they give the Parlatoria a little more money, so that they could put a few more men in the bureau.

It is a wonder these bureaucrats do not get worse mixed up than they are. They have to get their money in various bureaus, and there are so many of them doing the same thing, I imagine they have a great deal of trouble. Here is a bureau that is dealing with the Asiatic beetle, and another one with the Japanese beetle, another one with both beetles, another with Parlatoria, and so on, and so on, and so on, ad infinitum. Then they also include in this the fruit fly, both the Mexican and Mediterranean; there are not any. Oh, no; there are no Mediterranean fruit flies and there are no Mexican fruit worms in this country yet; but we have spent ten or twelve million dollars up to date in an effort to keep them out. The idea of Congress appropriating money for these purposes year by year is absolutely indefensible, in my judgment.

The President should not send these estimates to Congress; the Bureau of the Budget should not send them here; there ought to be an examination of these bureaus.

However, this fruit and shade tree insect investigation has been going on for 22 years, and they have spent $2,437,979 in carrying it on. This is one of the smaller bureaus. These insects are well looked after, because the personal services alone amount to $399,700, personal services to insects, maids to insects. This is a bureaucratic maid to aristocratic insects. This is one of the smaller bureaus. These insects are well looked after because the personal services alone amount to $399,700. That is the amount expended for personal services rendered to insects. This is a bureau for the rendering of personal service to these insects. Just think of that, Mr. President. Practically all of the appropriation is taken up in personal service. What is the bureau for if it is not to render personal services?

I now come to one of the strangest of all—barberry eradication. I suppose every Senator knows what it is. Some bureaucrat went out near a cornfield and found a barberry bush, and he evolved the theory that a worm that generated in corn or wheat and became a moth or a fly and flew over to the barberry bush did not hurt the corn at all in the beginning, but it eventually became a fly and flew over to a barberry bush and laid an egg and became a moth again and then flew back to the corn or the wheat, and it destroyed the corn or wheat. The department reports that it has pulled up by the roots 18,000 barberry bushes to do away with barberry rust. Think of that! They were asked if all barberry produced such a bug. They said no; that it is very strange that near many cornfields where there were barberry bushes around and where the bugs flew over to the barberry bushes and then flew back they did not do any harm. In other words, some barberry bushes are good and some barberry bushes are bad. So here we are appropriating year by year to eradicate the barberry bushes of the country. It is a very ornamental bush, a harmless bush.

We made more corn last year than the country could even use. It is down to 23 cents a bushel, and yet since this bureau has been established we have spent $4,385,086 to destroy the barberry bushes of the country. Most of it has been spent for personal services here in this city. This amendment ought to be adopted. More than $45,000 of this appropriation will be spent for travel pay on trains or in automobiles hunting barberry bushes. From the bulletin on barberry bushes I want to quote the following:

> The first survey is completed in all the 13 northern Central States except one, and the second and more extensive survey is in progress.

The first survey has been in existence or progress since 1918, only 14 years. The barberry bureau for the eradication of the barberry bush was created because a bug flew from a corn field onto a barberry bush and then flew back to the corn, and it might destroy the corn; and yet we have made more corn every year since 1918, with one or two possible exceptions, than we ever made before. Even so, in those 14 years we have spent $4,385,086 for the purpose of eradicating barberry bushes, and the bureau does not know which are the good and which are the bad.

Of course, this bureau ought to be abolished. It is a shame to legislate this money year after year for any such foolish purpose as is suggested here. Since 1918 there have been 18,000,000 barberry bushes destroyed. This bureau has located and destroyed 18,000,000 barberry bushes in 14 years. In passing, let me say that the barberry is a native of Europe and was imported into this country. The bureau say it is an undesirable immigrant. The bureau say they have reduced the rust somewhat by the expenditure of about $4,500,000. Probably if we appropriate $1,000,000,000 for them this year they might destroy more bushes, but the bushes come up just as rapidly as they are destroyed.

I read further from the bulletin:

> Many persons insist that all barberries ought to be killed out at this time.

I think that is a reasonable insistence.

In much of the barberry-eradication area, however, people have been planting barberries for the last 50 or 100 years. These have escaped from cultivation and have run wild in many places. It is asking a great deal of the Government and States to undo the work of so many years in a short time.

Yet they have had only 14 years. Perhaps when the great-great-great grandson of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON] is in the Senate they will still be eradicating barberry bushes out in New Mexico. It must be remembered that the bureau has had only 14 years in which to do this work.

Then, too, the barberry seed will lie in the soil a long time before germinating. They have all these troubles to consider. The bulletin closes with this injunction:

By all means keep up the barberry eradication campaign.

Sure! If they can keep up the campaign, they can keep up the bureau.

By all means keep up the barberry eradication campaign. It is perfectly clear that it is solving the rust problems in the States east of the Mississippi and north of the Ohio, and certainly it has been reducing the rust losses in other sections where the campaign has been in progress.

That does not follow, for this reason: We made more corn and wheat than ever before, and more than we could consume here or sell abroad.

And now we come to foreign plants introduction. This is a small appropriation, only $204,925, recommended by the President. Of this amount, $171,487, or practically all of it, is used for personal services. Let us see what they are to do.

For investigations in foreign seed and plant introduction, including the study, collection, purchase, testing, propagation, and distribution of rare and valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants from foreign countries and from our possessions, and for experiments with reference to their introduction and cultivation in this country.

The man who wrote that knew how to establish a bureau. He put enough things in that so that the bureau might work for a thousand years almost. This is a hoary bureau. It was established in 1899, and $3,189,651 has been expended on it already. There are 56 high-salaried bureaucrats who have been doing the work, and in the 33 years, after spending more than $3,000,000, they have not yet completed their investigation. That is sad. I think the best way to complete it is to strike the provision from the bill.

I sent for a bulletin on this subject. I thought perhaps in 33 years they had had time to prepare a bulletin, but one was not sent to me. Apparently they have not had time yet to prepare a bulletin. Thirty-three years is a very short time for a bureau to prepare a bulletin.

There is one thing that possibly may be studied by the bureau. I have been informed that they have introduced broccoli into this country. Like Mutt and Jeff, I am very fond of broccoli, and perhaps the introduction of broccoli will make up for the 33 years of existence of this hoary-headed bureau. If it is true that this bureau secured the introduction of broccoli into this country, I hope the chief of the bureau will advise me. I should like to claim it as a great accomplishment for the bureau.

Next we come to the botany investigation. We have 8,000,000 men out of employment in this country and the Government running $2,000,000,000 behind in operating expenses, and yet Mr. Hoover this year asks for $52,260 to further investigate botany:

For investigation and improvement in the utilization of wild plants and grazing lands, and to determine the distribution of weeds and means of their control.

Here we are asked to spend over $50,000 a year to know what to do with weeds. Those of us who were born and reared on a farm know what to do with weeds. It takes elbow grease and a good hoe or a good plow to get rid of weeds. We do not have to go to a bureau that has been in existence all these years to learn how to dispose of weeds.

Of this sum of $52,260, $47,210 is for personal services and $2,000 for travel pay. I suppose they have to travel out through various parts of the country to find out where the weeds are. There is $3,000 left, and I suppose that is spent for investigation, though, of course, I can not be certain, as some of it apparently was spent for rent, equipment, printing, and such things.

What could be more important at this time, I ask the Senate, than to determine the distribution of weeds and the means of their control? With our Government $2,000,000,000 behind in operating expenses, what an overshadowing question has been brought by the President and the Bureau of the Budget to the attention of the Senate in this item. What must we do with the weeds of the country? I suppose the 1932 weeds have not come up yet. When they come up next spring we must know how they are distributed and how to segregate them, so we have a bureau here in Washington to tell us about it. I remember, and I suppose other Senators remember, how our fathers taught us to dispose of weeds. We were given a hoe and told to go out and cut them down. We did not need any bureau here in Washington to tell us how to do it. Yet here is a bureau 64 years old that is still investigating to find out how to dispose of weeds and about the distribution of weeds.

Mr. President, this item shows how we allow these bureaus and their expenditures to grow. I sent to this bureau and asked for a bulletin on botany. While I have many bulletins that were sent to me, I find none on botany. I do not know much about botany and can not discuss it. I regret that in the short time this bureau has been in existence, only 60 years, we have not any bulletin from them on botany, and I hope some day when they get one I can read it, because when they get out a bulletin it is usually a good one. I hope these gentlemen, when they have had sufficient time—remember they have only been in existence 64 years—to get out a bulletin on botany will be good enough to send me a copy.

Botany was one of the subjects that I did not study when I was in school, and it is one that I have long wanted to study. I have an idea, away back in the back part of my head, that when this bureau gets time to prepare a bulletin on botany it is going to be a marvel of its kind, and I can get some real information on the subject, especially on the distribution of weeds.

Surely this bureau that has been established for 64 years, studying the distribution of weeds, can possibly give us some scientific information on that matter. Think of it, Mr. President, in this time of oppressive taxation, with the Government $2,000,000,000 behind in its operating expenses, with 8,000,000 people out of employment and many of them hungry—think of the Government spending all of this money to ascertain, among other things, the distribution of weeds! Again I say, it is a travesty upon Government.

INVESTIGATION OF HORTICULTURAL CROPS AND DISEASES

Another venerable bureau has charge of the investigation of horticultural crops and diseases. Whoever is at the head of that bureau is a fine financier. He has a splendid financial mind. I find that during the 44 years of the history of that bureau he has separated the Government from $14,038,929. Over $14,000,000 has been spent for the investigation of horticultural crops and diseases, and yet the bureau has not finished the investigation. Of course, by the time the Senator's great-grandson becomes old enough to become a Member of the Senate they may have a bulletin ready on the subject. We may have something of real interest after the expenditures, not only of $14,000,000 but of $14,000,000,000.

Now let me show just what this money is used for.

For investigation and control of diseases, for improvement of methods of culture, propagation, breeding, selection, and related activities concerned with the production of fruits, nuts—vegetables, ornamentals, and related plants; for investigation of methods of harvesting, packing, shipping, storing, and utilizing these products; and for the study of the physiological and related changes of such products during the process of marketing and while in commercial storage.

I want to emphasize "nuts"—

And so forth, and so forth.

Apparently there has been no specific bulletin on this subject. Of course, the bureau, having been in existence only 44 years, has not yet had time, probably, to get out a bulletin; but there ought to be something to show for this $14,000,000. All I can say is that they certainly have a dandy bureau. Apparently it is the best bureau in the Government. They have 1 man at $9,000 a year, 19 men at about $5,000 a year, 14 men at $4,000 a year, and 21 men at $3,400 a year.

That is the way we are spending the Government's money. Here is a recommendation by the Budget and approved by the President of the United States where this mammouth bureau which is virtually doing nothing, the head man getting $9,000 a year, 19 men receiving about $5,000 a year, 14 men $4,000 a year, and 21 men $3,400 a year. Any man who can build up a bureau like that ought to be Secretary of the Treasury. My heavens, what a financier he must be to extract all that money from the Government on such a pretext!

That is a real bureau! They have evidently built it up through the ages that have passed since it was started, and apparently it is in fine running order. The salary list is the best that I find in the agricultural budget. The total appropriation asked for by the President is $1,447,660.

Think of it, $1,447,000—of which $1,110,000 is for personal services, which means salaries of officials and clerk hire, and, in addition to that, there is a trifling sum for traveling expenses of $75,000.

Think of it, Mr. President! This has been going on for more than 40 years, and there is no let-up in it. When is this thing going to end? When will they get this information that they were asked for some 44 years ago? Do investigations never cease?

INVESTIGATION OF RUBBER, FIBER, AND OTHER TROPICAL PLANTS

The next item is so important to the people of this country it can not be overlooked. It is the investigation of rubber, fiber, and other tropical plants—"other tropical plants." We are not a tropical country; rubber does not grow in the United States; and yet, Mr. President, since the organization of this bureau nearly $2,000,000 have been appropriated to investigate the growth of rubber in the United States.

The appropriation for the investigation of rubber, fiber, and other tropical plants is a very small one. It began in the year 1900 and only $1,754,913 has been expended. I read the provision as given by the President:

> Rubber, fiber, and other tropical plants: For investigation of crops introduced from tropical regions, and for the improvement of rubber, abaca, and other fiber plants by cultural methods, breeding—

Listen to this—here is what this bureau is doing:

> Breeding, acclimatization, adaptation, and selection, and for investigation of their diseases—

That would require the services of a "rubber" doctor, I suppose—> and for determining the feasibility of increasing the production of hard fibers outside of the continental United States.

The total appropriation is $115,430 and the amount for personal services is $84,487.

Mr. President, here is a bureau that has been trying since the year 1900 to ascertain whether rubber and kindred tropical plants can be introduced into this country. I asked for a bulletin about this matter, and one has not been furnished me, so I suppose there is no such bulletin; but, as they have had only 32 years in which to get out a bulletin, we must not hurry them. It may be that one of these days we will get a bulletin as to how to raise tropical plants in the United States.

NEMATOLOGY

There is a very small appropriation in this bill for crop technological investigations, including the study of plant-infesting "nematodes."

We have other bureaus looking into worms, as has heretofore been shown. There appears to be some duplication; but this has such a fine name—"nematology"—that I do not see how any Senator could find it in his heart to vote for just $58,260 to investigate very small worms, especially when those worms are called "nematodes."

This is another rather hoary bureau. It has been with us since 1906. It is true that the appropriations never have been large. Evidently the financial head of this bureau has not shown himself a good money getter. If he had adopted the methods of those engaged in investigating horticultural crops and diseases, he would have gotten a great deal more money out of the Government. It may be, though, because this is a microscopic worm that the chief was good enough to take the position that we ought to have a miscroscopic appropriation for it.

FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE

Mr. President, I am told—of course, I myself do not know, but I am told—that a great deal of good has been done by appropriations to combat the foot-and-mouth disease. It has been suggested facetiously many times that animals were not the only ones afflicted with foot-and-mouth disease; and that may be so.

This is another rather hoary bureau. It has been with us since 1902. There has been appropriated since that time, all told, the sum of $10,561,503 to eradicate this disease. The last big appropriation seems to have been in 1924. There seems not to have been any foot-and-mouth disease since that time; so we have just been reappropriating the unexpended balances of the appropriation of $3,500,000 contained in the second deficiency appropriation act of 1924; and all that is done this time is to reappropriate the portion still unexpended. I find that there is an unobligated balance of $1,436,017.

Mr. President, we have a bureau standing by ready at any moment to attack the foot-and-mouth disease; and the bureau no doubt will last as long as that unexpended balance can be carried on from year to year.

Of course, this item ought to come out of the bill. The Congress is nearly always in session, and if the foot-and-mouth disease breaks out it can be looked after and will be looked after. We ought not to keep a perpetual bureau here waiting for the foot-and-mouth disease to break out.

HOG CHOLERA

The bureau dealing with hog cholera was established in 1914. There has been expended up to date $4,533,150 to stamp out hog cholera. It is true that although it has been only 18 years since the work was started the bureau has issued a bulletin. The bulletin is very complete and shows exactly how the disease can be prevented and treated and eradicated. It seems to me the department has done everything that is possible. As I understand, there has been no epidemic of hog cholera in quite a number of years, and there ought not to be an appropriation for that purpose; yet the President has recommended $466,380 for that purpose for this year.

SOUTHERN CATTLE TICKS

Another hoary bureau is the one charged with looking after southern cattle ticks. It was established in 1907. The Government has contributed $13,695,595 since that time. The President estimates that $724,400 will be used for that purpose in 1933.

A bulletin has been issued on this subject, in the foreword of which this is said:

> The methods of eradication have been improved from time to time as new facts became known; and it may be stated that the methods have reached such a degree of perfection and have had such a wide practical test that the question of how to eradicate the tick is no longer an essential part of the problem. The main part of the task is to have hearty, vigorous, and conscientious cooperation of the people. In other words, the work will progress just as rapidly as the people desire it shall.

In that statement, Mr. President, is to be found a complete answer to this large appropriation for southern cattle ticks. The bulletin shows just precisely how the ticks can be eradicated, and the only appropriation necessary is one to enable these bulletins to be distributed. It is a waste of the people's money to do anything else, according to the statement of the bulletin itself; yet we have a large bureau here in Washington, and out of this appropriation of

CROP AND LIVESTOCK ESTIMATES

The work of preparing crop and livestock estimates was begun in 1864 during the Civil War. There has been spent on it altogether a total of $13,687,816. The President recommends that $790,320 be expended for this purpose in 1933.

This bureau, as I say, has been at work since 1864. Whether or not it does any good to the farmers is very doubtful. I think the crop estimates now provided for by law are exceedingly hurtful to prices. I know that there are certain great classes of cotton in Memphis where the Government virtually fixes the price by publishing every morning a statement as to the value of that cotton. We ought not to do it. The Department of Agriculture has been making these crop estimates, and they have simply become a part of the cotton-gambling program of the various cotton exchanges of the country. I should like to see the whole thing done away with, certainly the way it is used.

Let me add, Mr. President, that to my mind there is nothing more hurtful to the prices of cotton and wheat in this country than the crop estimates that are issued from time to time by the Bureau of Crop Estimates in the Department of Agriculture. Sometimes they hit it and sometimes they miss it, but at all times the farmers are injured by the publication of the estimates. I do not think we ought to spend a cent for such work; I think it ought to be stopped.

COTTON STATISTICS

The same thing is true, and even more true, of the work of the Bureau of Cotton Statistics. We have spent $1,773,898 on cotton statistics, and I do not believe they do any good.

MARKET-INSPECTION SERVICE

The same thing is also true of the market-inspection service. This bureau has been in existence since 1918. We have spent $4,671,946 on it since that time. While we spend a large sum now on market-inspection service—namely, $541,896, as shown on page 157—I do not believe it benefits the farmers in any appreciable degree.

COLOR INVESTIGATION

I next come to color investigations. The President has recommended $90,960 for this purpose. With the Government $2,000,000,000 behind in its running expenses and with the probability that it will be $6,000,000,000 behind in another year, with 8,000,000 people out of employment, and probably hundreds of thousands of them hungry, we are spending the Government's money for color investigations. Let me read what the item is:

> For investigation and experiment in the utilization for coloring, medicinal and technical purposes of raw materials grown or produced in the United States in cooperation with such persons, associations, or corporations as may be found necessary, including repairs, alterations, improvements, or additions to a building on the Arlington Experimental Farm.

Color investigations! Men and women starving in America, 8,000,000 out of employment in America, and the Government wasting its money on color investigations!

Here is another appropriation of $71,040 for forest economics. What is forest economics?

Mr. KING. Jobs.

Mr. McKELLAR. We might just as well establish a bureau for goat economics. Out of the $71,000 appropriated for this purpose $53,264 is for personal services. It is just another bureau.

Forest research is an item of the same kind. The total appropriation is $535,080, of which $403,240 is for personal services. Up to date over $13,000,000 has been spent for forest research, with people hungry and starving in America.

Mr. President, the various items I have named in these 29 amendments amount approximately to $151,000,000. We talk about economy, and yet here is the Budget Bureau directing the appropriation of $151,000,000 for these 29 bureaus, which, all put together, are either entirely out of date and serving no useful purpose or are altogether not worth a million dollars.

Mr. President, I am as much interested in agriculture as any man in this body, or any man in the United States for that matter, because I believe that the basis of all our prosperity is in the soil. I have selected these 29 appropriations in the agricultural bill simply because that bill came up first. There are equally useless bureaus in every department of the Government. Heaven knows, it is not because of anything against the farmer. These appropriations are not really for the farmer. They are for the bureaucrats who are working the farmer and at the same time working the Government.

We ought not to appropriate money to these bureaus in the way we have been doing. When the Government was rich and received more money than it could spend there might have been some excuse for this profligacy, but there is not any such excuse for it now. There ought to be a committee appointed by the Vice President to examine into the question of these appropriations.

I stop here long enough to say that I offered such an amendment some time ago, but after doing so I saw a bill that was introduced by the distinguished senior Senator from Arkansas, my friend Mr. ROBINSON, for a joint commission to be created by the House and the Senate, and I think that is the very best plan. I hope the bill may soon be reported out and passed by this Congress, so that the joint commission can take up this question of useless bureaus, of duplicating bureaus, of bureaus that are idly spending the people's money year after year, and the Congress does not even pass on the matter; because, as I explained to the Senate awhile ago, all these appropriations that have been authorized by law just come along year after year and are passed over without even reading them.

Mr. President, we must balance our Budget. It is the only way to keep this Government where it should be. Great Britain got behind $600,000,000, and the very fact that she was behind $600,000,000 in her running expenses caused a political revolution in that country. There was an overwhelming vote in favor of balancing the budget, and she did balance the budget, and she acted wisely when she balanced the budget.

Think where we are. We are not only $600,000,000 behind; we are over $3,000,000,000 behind right now, because we have appropriated $1,250,000,000 since this Congress met in December. We already have a deficit of $2,000,000,000. In addition to that we have authorized a billion and a half dollars of bonds for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. We are going to authorize other big appropriations; and the President has sent in to us a Budget of $4,600,000,000. Our income is only $3,000,000,000, and in fact it is not even that. We do not know that we will get that amount. Then we are going to add another billion to it, according to the news from the House; and, suppose we do. That will be $4,000,000,000; and with all those additional taxes, the way I figure it out—and I believe my figures are correct—we will be somewhere between five and six billion dollars in the hole by July 1, 1933.

We can not balance the Budget in any other way than by cutting down these appropriations. We ought to start in with this first bill; and I am going to ask for a record vote, and I hope it will be granted, on the first one of these amendments. If it is voted down, I suppose it will be useless to go through the form in every case; but I am going to ask for a record vote on the barberry amendment.

I move to strike from the bill the appropriation for the barberry bureau; and I want to implore the Members of the Senate to consider the seriousness of what is in front of them. With our Government already owing all this money, and with the probability that the amount is going to increase greatly, I ask you, gentlemen of the Senate, to join me in cutting down these appropriations. As a practical matter, they are not needed. Let us cut them down where they can be cut down; and in these 29 bureaus they can be cut down.

I thank the Senate.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield the floor.

Mr. McNARY. Then we are to understand that the Senator will be content with offering the one amendment to which he has referred?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; there are several very important ones. Let us try the barberry bush amendment. I should like to have a vote on that first, because it is a typical case.

Mr. McNARY. I agree with that; but the Senator will be content with that as a test, and will abandon the others if that one is not agreed to?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not feel like abandoning the others. I do not like the word "abandon." I never abandon a position I have taken where I thought it was right. If it was wrong, I am very happy to abandon it.

Mr. McNARY. Very well; then we will refrain from using the word "abandon."

Mr. McKELLAR. But let us see what the vote is. Let us have a vote on the barberry amendment. I will find it among the papers on my desk in just a moment.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement recently issued by the Secretary of Agriculture in regard to the bulletins prepared by that department.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GEORGE in the chair). Is there objection?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What is the request of the Senator?

Mr. PATTERSON. I requested unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement recently issued by the Secretary of Agriculture in regard to bulletins prepared by that department.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, pending the request of the Senator from Missouri I desire to bring a matter to the attention of the Senate.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-seven Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. PATTERSON] submitted a request for unanimous consent, which request has been temporarily suspended by myself.

I believe it is fair and just that the Senate should have brought to its attention the very unusual, the almost inexplicable, course which is being pursued by the Secretary of Agriculture. One finds difficulty in accounting for his action in certain particulars, to which attention is to be brought on any theory of fair-mindedness and intelligence on the part of the Secretary.

The particular document which it is asked shall be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is nothing more than an attempt on the part of the Secretary of Agriculture to reply to criticisms which have been made here and elsewhere directed against publications and proceedings by the department of which he is presumed to be the head. For my part I have not the slightest objection to any statement which the Secretary would like to have published in reply to criticisms of his administration of the office which he is so highly honored by being permitted to fill.

The bill before the Senate carries the astonishing sum of almost three and a half million dollars, to be accurate, in excess of $3,369,350, for publicity purposes. The items which make up this aggregate appear on pages 69 to 72 of the bill before the Senate.

There is authorized $812,320 "for acquiring and diffusing among the people of the United States useful information on subjects connected with the marketing, handling, utilization, grading, transportation, and distributing of farm and nonmanufactured food products, and the purchasing of farm supplies," and so forth.

There is also incorporated a provision for the appropriation of a fund of $785,020 "for collecting, compiling, abstracting, analyzing, summarizing, interpreting, and publishing data relating to agriculture, including crop and livestock estimates, acreage, yield, grades, staples of cotton, stocks, and value of farm crops, and numbers, grades, and value of livestock and livestock products on farms, in cooperation with the Extension Service and other Federal, State, and local agencies."

In addition to these two enormous sums there is provided a further fund of $365,790 for "acquiring and diffusing useful information regarding agriculture, and for other purposes," having relation, among other things, to the export of agricultural products.

Finally, under Market News Service is this provision:

> For collecting, publishing, and distributing, by telegraph, mail, or otherwise, timely information on the market supply and demand, commercial movement, location, disposition, quality, condition, and market prices of livestock, meats, fish, and animal products, dairy and poultry products, fruits and vegetables, peanuts and their products, grain, cottonseed, hay, feeds, tobacco, and seeds, and other agricultural products, independently and in cooperation with other branches of the Government, State agencies, purchasing and consuming organizations, and persons engaged in the production, transportation, marketing, and distribution of farm and food products, $1,406,220.

Making the aggregate of almost three and a half million dollars of which mention was made in the beginning of these remarks.

The Secretary of Agriculture has assumed to frank out in official envelopes a statement made by himself consisting of an attack on Democrats in the body at the other end of the Capitol. He has done that at the expense of the Government, with money provided by the Congress of the United States.

I hold in my hand one of the official envelopes which incorporated the statement to which I have referred, and which, presumably, was sent out under the item last read, Market News Service. On the envelope is printed: "United States Department of Agriculture. Office of the Secretary. Washington, D. C. Official business."

Then there is the common stamp on the envelope, "Penalty for private use," and so forth.

It seems that the department has established the practice of sending out to country newspapers throughout the United States what is alleged to be information concerning the market, and to all newspapers which have been in the habit of receiving such communications from the department the Secretary is alleged to have sent the attack on the Democratic membership of the House of Representatives, which I mentioned a few moments ago.

The statement is headed:

> Statement by Secretary of Agriculture Arthur M. Hyde, February 28, 1932.

I quote portions of the statement by the Secretary:

> Yesterday the Democratic organization in the House railroaded through a bill for $132,000,000 for roads.

Just what relationship that declaration has to "market news service" I would like to have the gigantic intellect which dominates the agricultural interests of this Nation in the name of the Secretary of Agriculture explain. There is, of course, no objection to the Secretary entertaining any view which he may be prompted to entertain concerning the House Democratic leadership. There is no objection to his expressing it. But there arises a question of ethics and morals when he undertakes to carry on his political campaign by the misappropriation and false and improper use of public money, and if he or anyone here is lacking in the moral principle and the intelligence required to see the truth of this, I am unable to find language which can be properly spoken here to describe his lack of comprehension and intelligence. We are wasting public money by appropriating large general funds for publicity purposes—money which is used for political purposes by a Secretary of Agriculture, whose ethical standards are so at variance with those commonly accepted that they can not be described in parliamentary language.

Congress should hardly be expected, considering the condition of the Treasury, to provide campaign funds for members of the Cabinet in this administration.

To give an illustration of what newspaper editors and publishers think of the course pursued by the Secretary in abusing his power and in misusing public funds for political purposes, I read from the letter of a country newspaper publisher who, immediately upon receipt of this contemptible document, transmitted it to me:

I am sending you herewith a copy of what I think is the rankest thing that has come under my observation during the 30 years of my experience in newspaper work. The Department of Agriculture maintains a publicity service which it furnishes to weekly papers such as mine, but such service is supposed to deal solely with matters of farm interest and not with politics. I can not conceive of such a thing being passed out to the country papers under the guise of "farm news service." I think this is one of the rawest things that ever came under my observation—

And so forth.

The Secretary, after repeatedly denouncing the measure referred to as having been railroaded through the House by the Democrats, characterized it as a "pork-barrel" measure. His object, of course, was not to influence legislation. What was his object? What was the purpose of the Secretary in sending in a franked envelope to newspaper publishers a statement of the character described? Was it in compliance with the lofty purposes which presumably inspire Cabinet officers? No; it was a display of pettishness, of littleness of mind that is reflected in neglect of public duty in order to promote political advantage. He could not have expected to do anything more than to arouse criticism of Democrats in Congress.

The bill referred to was not regarded as strictly a partisan measure. It was almost identical with another bill that passed this body and the House a year ago by a unanimous vote, or nearly such, in both bodies, and which received the approval of the President. True, it was an emergency measure. It is also true that the emergency which prompted and apparently justified the first bill has not yet passed. The vote in the House on this bill—that is, the bill which the Secretary characterizes and condemns in his message to country newspapers, in his "farm marketing news service"—was yeas 205, nays 109. Of the yeas, 150 were cast by Democrats and 55 were cast by Republicans. Of the 109 nays, 12 were cast by Democrats and 97 by Republicans. There was a large number of absentees, some Members voting "present."

The Secretary did not realize that, instead of popularizing his own attitude, he was, perhaps, inviting criticism of the position he occupied, because there is a general feeling that the construction of rural post roads is a very practical and effective way of providing employment for those who require it in communities remote from the great centers.

But the merits of the bill, the fact that an almost identical measure passed both Houses of the Congress nearly unanimously, and the fact that this measure passed the body at the other end of the Capitol by large votes on both sides of the Chamber, are not essential to the question that I am now discussing, and that is that it is immoral and well-nigh indecent to use public funds, moneys appropriated from the Treasury of the United States, for partisan political purposes. It can not be justified when done by anyone, no matter whether he be a Democrat or a Republican. But when a member of the President's Cabinet resorts to methods of the character which I have described and pursues the policy of using trust funds in his hands—trust funds that have been amassed from 20-cent wheat and 5-cent cotton, or from whatever source—he puts himself in a position that no one in this body dare rise to defend unless he wishes to mark himself with the indelible brand of infamy.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the request of the Senator from Missouri. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have no objection.

Mr. HARRISON. I can see no objection. This is the matter which I answered in my speech in the Senate on yesterday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD, as requested.

The statement is as follows:

STATEMENT BY ARTHUR M. HYDE, SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE, FOR EDITOR AND PUBLISHER

The Department of Agriculture realizes it has much to learn. We welcome criticism. I hope we are not so impervious as to fail to profit from it. But the criticism should be constructive, and the critic should know his facts.

Lately we have had the other kind a plenty. I believe that editors who have followed the widespread tirades against our farmers' bulletins will agree that most of the statements have been short on truth. The criticism originated with the United States Chamber of Commerce, and was relayed via the Senate Chamber, barbed with wit, embellished with wisecracks, and camouflaged under the fair name of economy. But the gentlemen who originated and transmitted the outburst were in blissful ignorance of the facts.

A few of the facts:

Sixty per cent of the alleged bulletins criticized never were printed by this department. They were articles printed by commercial magazines, the unemotional editors of which paid their own hard money for typesetters and white paper because they thought the information was of some value.

A bulletin on window curtaining was printed by the department. We issued it with the double-barrelled purpose of offering to the wives in humble homes an inexpensive method of making the home attractive, and of widening the market for cotton. It was printed at the request of cotton producers for whom a large demand for cotton would be a boom. Indeed, Congress has instructed several branches of the Government to try to widen the market for cotton.

A bulletin called "Lamb As You Like It" did not prove to the liking of a senatorial humorist. In that respect he differs from more than 200,000 of his fellow citizens who took the pains and bought stamps to write for it. He differs from producers who realized that a prejudice existed against lamb because housewives did not cook the meat properly.

The statement, made by this same Senator and spread throughout the country, that "we could forego * * * the $20,000,000 that we are using for the preparation and publication of bulletins" needs some important qualifications, reservations, and limitations, as well as much salt and ketchup before it can be swallowed.

The total output of the public Printing Office last year cost fifteen and one-half million dollars. Deduct two and one-half million spent by Congress. Deduct, roughly, another six and one-half million for job printing for the Treasury, Patent Office, and all other units of government, and the twenty million has shriveled to six and one-half million or thereabouts to pay for every governmental book, report, publication, or bulletin in all the executive and judicial branches of the Government. Many of these reports are required by acts of Congress.

Of the remaining six and one-half million, the Department of Agriculture spent last year $212,601 for farmers' bulletins and leaflets. The people of the United States wrote in, asked for, and received 17,000,000 such bulletins. They cost 1¼ cents a copy!

An 8-page bulletin on rompers brought a snort of senatorial satire. The total cost of that bulletin was only $1,018 for 130,000 copies. The cost therefore was about equal to the expense of printing the Senator's quips in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD (free and bound editions). However, an important difference is that the people have already demanded 130,000 copies of the romper bulletin.

The Senator talked about a publication on the Love Life of the Bullfrog. Since when was the Bureau of Fisheries transferred to the Department of Agriculture? In any case, the only publication on frogs ever issued by the Department of Commerce was a technical treatise which came out back in 1919. It constituted a real contribution to biological knowledge and answered a demand for information on growing frogs for market.

For popular bulletins, which in a very real sense are part of this department's program of free education, we spend annually less than one-fifth of 1 cent per capita. Of the 750 different popular bulletins that we distribute, less than a dozen have been criticized. That's a pretty good average for any concern. These 12 are mostly in the field of home economics. It's a curious thing that our bulletins on fertilizers, plant propagation, disease, and insect control escape passing jibes, but as soon as we dare tell a woman how to use cheap cotton fabrics in dressing her child healthfully, the wrath of the critics is turned loose. These criticized bulletins cost about $2,300 a year! One recent speech by a Senator increased the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD printing bill by $11,500.

We publish other bulletins, many of them technical studies. These are issued in small editions for scientists specializing in the subjects. They are not for the avèrage reader. Strangely enough these are not criticized. They are science, and entitled to respect, but when science steps into working clothes and goes out to the kitchen or the field to give practical application to her truths through the medium of the inexpensive bulletins or leaflets, then she subjects herself to the jibes of the uninformed.

One idea behind popular bulletins is the idea behind the public schools and the State universities. It is the idea behind the second-class mail rate, the idea that education and information are worth while.

Editors ought to understand more clearly than most others the basic reason for these bulletins. Most newspapers accept the burden of answering questions from readers. Some newspapers subscribe for a syndicated service that agrees to answer the questions that come in from readers. Replies to readers cost money, but newspapers accept it as part of their job. How much more is it the job of a public agency like the Department of Agriculture, supported by public funds and employing specialists who are recognized as authorities in their fields!

Our knowledge—no matter how developed—is public property. Every citizen has the privilege of writing to the department for information. Our specialists are investigating under specific appropriations provided for study of specific problems. The information is on tap for anyone who wants it, whether it is new or old. If the 6,000,000 separate farms do not turn to us or to the cooperating State institutions for information in usable form, where are they to get it? If they can't turn to us, why have a Department of Agriculture?

In the early days of the department it soon became evident that specialists were spending time and effort in replies to oft-repeated questions which could be answered better, more comprehensively, and much more economically with printed pamphlets. To-day the interest of the public is the principal determinant in selecting subjects for new popular bulletins. While a bulletin costs about 1¼ cents, a letter costs anywhere from 25 cents to a dollar. If a farmer writes to us and asks for information on onion culture and we reply, "We're sorry, but we can't tell you anything about onions because many people feel it wouldn't be a proper function of government," the cost for that short letter would be several times the cost of a bulletin that gives adequate information on growing onions. Quite obviously we wouldn't write such a negative type of letter. We would do the best we could to satisfy the request. The cost would be proportionately higher. If we spent less for bulletins we would spend much more for correspondence and many persons would have to go without.

From the standpoint of cost to the department and to the taxpayer we have found the press is the most economical channel for getting the fact to the man who can put it to work, but when editors find news or information in the achievements of the department they create a demand for bulletins that give more detailed information than a newspaper or periodical can be expected to supply. We try to meet the demand. Last year we were able to supply only about half the publications for which we had requests. It costs less on the average to print a bulletin than the 2-cent stamp the inquirer uses to ask for it.

A list of titles of agricultural publications sets off the hair-trigger humorist. An onion bulletin is good for a laugh except from the man who has his troubles growing and marketing onions. Ants make a picnic, and cheese is a strong spread for wisecrackers. But does this make for adequate or helpful criticism? In looking over examples of frothy fault-finding I have often wondered why it is that home economics bulletin titles draw so much male ridicule. Perhaps it is because it is easy to make fun of something you know little about.

One criticism that seems to me most deserving of consideration is that we are trying to teach in too many fields. I see the point of an editor in the Kansas wheat fields who wonders why we have a bulletin on mushroom growing. I have often wondered why a certain bulletin was published, and when I've investigated I have found there is a reason—usually a good reason—that the specialists need it to answer questions. That is the explanation for the leaflet on How to Make a Cat-Trap, which puzzled a good many. That 4-page leaflet, illustrated, makes a far better reply than a letter without illustrations. Why trap cats? Ask the man who wants the assistance of birds in his garden and orchard. Ask the farmer who wants to save his poultry. Ask the public-health official, who knows that stray cats spread disease.

Many people assume that the department scatters its bulletins helter-skelter, hoping that 1 out of 10, or thereabouts, will find a reader rather than a wastebasket. On the contrary, we do not mail bulletins unless an individual has written to the department and specifically requested information contained in a bulletin. We don't even try to stimulate requests. To the press we issue a notice of the availability of a new bulletin. The knowledge of the bulletin's availability spreads from there on. If the present barrage of criticism hasn't done anything else, it has certainly stimulated people to pour more requests for publications into our laps.

The department values and has benefited from intelligent criticisms of its publications. No group is more capable of giving us good advice in this respect than newspaper editors, who are paying more attention to science and agriculture than ever before. If I object to most of the recent comment on bulletins, it is because it obviously is based on misinformation which many editors appear to have accepted as trustworthy. When a Senator echoes a propagandist in suggesting that the Government could save $20,000,000 if we stopped printing bulletins, it is claptrap. When editors accept this in good faith and reason accordingly it becomes serious. Any editor can demand and get the facts in regard to publications, or for any specific publication—how much it cost, why it was printed, and information in regard to demand for distribution.

If the propagandists who are taking pot shots at the department really mean that we should abandon what is one of the most economical and effective methods of popular education and information, if they think the Government should discharge all its scientists, or let them work on without revealing the results, it would mean a change in policy that ought to be discussed seriously. It would deserve treatment more substantial than facile wit and wisecracks.

On the other hand, if they are interested in seeing rigid economy practiced by all Government departments we are with them. We've reduced our budget by millions. We've decreased our printing fund by $75,000. We've decreased travel. We will continue to take second place to none in economizing and in increasing efficiency. The chairman of the House Committee that handles the department's appropriation bill said the other day: "From my investigation I believe this department * * * has cooperated with the President 100 per cent in striving to reduce expenses. * * * It is striving with might and main to conduct an economical administration."

A bulletin is the most tangible evidence of a Government expenditure. The critic can hold it in his hand and shout about extravagance. The critic focuses on what seems to him a triviality and distorts it as characteristic of the whole. These bulletins are not published to waste the taxpayers' money. Rather they are our cheapest method of doing a very necessary job.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] yesterday moved to reconsider the vote by which the Budget recommendation favorable to an increase in the grasshopper item was incorporated in the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. McNARY. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. Would not the Senator be willing to take to conference the various amendments which I have offered and work them out there? In view of what has been said and what appear to be the facts in reference to the amendments, I hope that the Senator will be willing to accept them and let them go to conference.

Mr. McNARY. Oh, no. Of course, that is an unusual and fatuous request. It is unthinkable and unfair legislation. I would not be carrying out the desires and purposes and expressed views of the Senate. Of course, I would not do a thing like that.

The junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] yesterday, as he will recall, interposed a motion to reconsider the vote on the grasshopper item. Is it the desire of the Senator to discuss that subject at this time?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] desires to discuss the matter, and I wanted to use it as a vehicle for a few observations generally upon the bill. If it is agreeable to the Senator, I am willing to pass it over for the present.

Mr. McNARY. I had hoped we could conclude the consideration of the bill to-day.

Mr. KING. I do not think the Senator can do so. The Senator knows that I have made no observations at all upon the bill.

Mr. McNARY. Does the Senator so desire?

Mr. KING. I expect to speak upon the bill.

Mr. McNARY. At any length?

Mr. KING. Yes; perhaps an hour.

Mr. McNARY. Could the Senator proceed at this time?

Mr. KING. Can we not proceed with some other amendments?

Mr. McNARY. I would prefer, if I may choose the course that may be pursued, to take up the amendments offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] at a later time. There is quite a number of them to be considered, and I should like to go through them without the interruption of a recess.

Mr. McKELLAR. I would suggest that we take them up when we convene to-morrow.

Mr. McNARY. It is the desire of an overwhelming majority that we may recess over this afternoon until Monday.

Mr. McKELLAR. That would be perfectly satisfactory to me.

DISTRIBUTION OF GOVERNMENT-OWNED WHEAT

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 110) authorizing the distribution of Government-owned wheat to the American National Red Cross and other organizations for relief of distress, which was to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert:

That the Federal Farm Board is authorized and directed to take such action as may be necessary to make available, at any time prior to May 1, 1933, on application by the American National Red Cross, or any other organization designated by the American National Red Cross, wheat of the Grain Stabilization Corporation, for use in providing food for the needy and distressed people of the United States and Territories, and for feed for livestock in the 1931 crop-failure areas. Such wheat shall be delivered upon any such application only upon the approval of the President of the United States, and in such amounts to each organization as the President may approve, except that the total amount of wheat delivered as hereinbefore authorized shall not be in excess of 40,000,000 bushels.

SEC. 2. No part of the expenses incident to the delivery, receipt, and distribution of such wheat shall be borne by the United States or the Federal Farm Board. Such wheat may be milled or exchanged for flour or feed, but if processed it shall be without profit to any mill, organization, or other person. In cities of over 25,000 population the American National Red Cross or any other organization designated by it may have said flour obtained in accordance with section 2 baked into bread or processed into food for distribution: Provided, That no part of the expense incident to such baking or processing shall be paid out of said wheat or flour and no part of said expense shall be borne by the United States or the Federal Farm Board.

SEC. 3. The Federal Farm Board shall keep account of all wheat delivered as authorized in section 1 and shall credit the account of the Grain Stabilization Corporation with an amount equal to the current market value thereof at the time of delivery.

Mr. NORBECK. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from South Dakota a question or two regarding the joint resolution. In what respect does the amendment adopted by the House differ from the joint resolution passed by the Senate?

Mr. NORBECK. The Senate passed two measures.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that and the House has incorporated them into one measure.

Mr. NORBECK. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Is there any material difference between the measures passed by the Senate and the measure which now comes from the House of Representatives?

Mr. NORBECK. There is no material difference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from South Dakota to concur in the House amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, after conferring with other Senators who have amendments pending I think time would be made by recessing at this time until Monday.

RELIEF OF NAVAJO, ZUNI, AND APACHE INDIANS IN ARIZONA

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. Out of order, I submit a resolution and ask that it may be read, and then I shall ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the resolution be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 179), as follows:

Whereas a series of blizzards without precedent in the history of the Southwest has destroyed more than 200,000 of the sheep belonging to the Navajo, Zuni, and Apache Tribes, and has brought about a condition of starvation among the livestock which, unless met at once, will result in the destruction of percentages of the Indian-owned sheep running as high as 60 per cent or higher in some areas; and

Whereas the destruction of the livestock of these tribes means the destruction of their chief and frequently their only source of self-support, and if allowed to go forward will necessitate the feeding of thousands of Indians at Government expense, with the incidental demoralization of the economic system of the tribes, and ultimately will compel the Government to spend a very large sum in the purchase of sheep to restock the reservations; and

Whereas the Department of Agriculture has under its control funds which could immediately be lent to these Indians, with their sheep as security, thus making it possible for the Indians to keep their sheep alive by feeding until the spring grass comes; and

Whereas it is impossible for the Department of Agriculture to extend this aid to the Indians except with the consent and cooperation of the Department of the Interior and Bureau of Indian Affairs; and

Whereas, although informed of the facts, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs has practically obstructed the action of the Department of Agriculture through proposing that funds legally under the jurisdiction of the Department of Agriculture shall be transferred to the Department of the Interior, a proposal difficult or impossible to meet within the terms of existing law and regulations: Therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs should move instantly to bring the help of the Department of Agriculture to the Indians in the manner which is feasible under existing law and existing regulations, by enabling the Indians to hypothecate their livestock to the Government and by assisting the Department of Agriculture with all means at their command to extend the necessary credit to the Indians in the most expeditious possible manner.

Mr. FRAZIER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the resolution involves a matter of departmental consideration. I think it is important to consider the resolution, and I would not want at this time to ask that it go over under the rule.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. I desire first to thank the Senator from Oregon for yielding. The resolution relates to a subject of some controversy and of vast importance. It will be remembered that on January 4 last I introduced to the deficiency bill my amendment for $75,000 to purchase food for stormbound Indians in northern Arizona and northern New Mexico and to purchase feed to save the flocks and herds of these Indians. At that time I told the Senate that commencing with November 21 last, snowstorms and blizzards of Siberian ferocity and Arctic fury had fallen upon the Indian reservations in northern Arizona and northern New Mexico, where dwell over 50,000 pure-blood Indians. These storms came at intervals and for many weeks the whole of that Indian country, 20,000 square miles in area, was as a marble ocean.

Indians perished in the snowdrifts, starved in the storms, and froze in the frosts. Their mainstays of support and subsistence are sheep and goats, and these winds and snows, with the thermometer ranging from 10 to 30 degrees below, decimated the Indians' herds and flocks.

The Indian Bureau here and the superintendents of the various reservations in the field put forth valiant efforts at relief, and I stated then that an appropriation of $75,000 was necessary to purchase food for the Indians and feed for their sheep and goats.

The two Houses of Congress agreed to my amendment and the item became a law.

Since I spoke those words on January 4 last another snowstorm, accompanied by extreme cold and cyclonic winds, struck that region.

These Indians, in addition to following their immemorial pastoral pursuits, also make blankets, rugs, silver ornaments, and pottery.

These different tribes inhabiting this 20,000 square miles represent various cultural standards; one tribe may be nomadic and pastoral and another may be sedentary and agricultural.

Mr. President, it is sometimes asserted that noblesse oblige and gallantry are extinct in this mechanical and scientific age, and that sympathy for human suffering does not touch the heart as once it did; but as against such assertions I now relate an episode of valor and high emprise as follows: The severity of the storms made it impossible for trucks or even for horsemen to traverse the storm-swept region, whereupon the Air Corps of the Army sent out seven bombing planes, and these bombing planes, like great birds of mercy, dropped down upon these widely scattered and famishing Indian families who could not be reached by horsemen, not steel messengers of death, but packages of food. Each package or bundle weighed 100 pounds and contained tea, coffee, sugar, bacon, and bread.

I do not agree with any suggestion made by resolution or otherwise that the Bureau of Indian Affairs was at all remiss or negligent in this behalf. On the contrary, I am bound to say, as a man who desires to be fair, that the Bureau of Indian Affairs and the superintendents and all the personnel in the field did everything within their power to extend relief.

Congress frequently thanks this soldier or that citizen, but I have the unique distinction this afternoon, on behalf of the Indians of that region, to thank Congress. Amidst the shower of approbrious epithets heaped upon Congress, I, on behalf of these Indian tribes and at their request, thank Congress for the passage of my amendment making available $75,000, which went into the deficiency bill, to aid the Indians and to purchase feed for their sheep and goats.

These Indians are our wards, and if we permit them to perish, if we permit their holdings of livestock to be reduced to the point where the Indians become charges upon the Treasury, the fault and blame will be ours. Embraced in the membership of these different tribes are men of acumen, of industry, of purpose, and of upstanding integrity. It is well worth the attention of this Congress to take measures looking toward assisting them in replenishing their herds of sheep and goats, and I again say that I do not join in any criticism of the Bureau of Indian Affairs.

To permit these tribes to be extinguished would be a foul blot and an angry scar upon our Government.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, the situation existing on the Navajo Reservation presents some very serious aspects. With every reasonable effort to lend assistance I am in hearty sympathy. The Senators from Arizona and the Senators from New Mexico have collaborated in an effort to aid in relieving the distress.

The resolution proposed by the Senator from North Dakota, however, is a proposal with which I am not familiar. I had no notice that he intended to offer it. He and I have not discussed it. The resolution presents a unique suggestion, and one that I should like to consider. In view of the fact that I have not considered it, and have had no opportunity to do so, I shall ask that it go over until Monday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over under the rule.

RECESS UNTIL MONDAY

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon on Monday.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until Monday, March 7, 1932, at 12 o'clock meridian.

FRIDAY, MARCH 4, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Heavenly Father, we lift our hearts unto Thee and pray for a quickening of all our best powers. So direct us that our duties shall be performed in wisdom and in discretion. If we have anxiety, quiet it; if we have groundless fear, put it to rest. O God, may we have a deep, sincere appreciation of moral values. Bless us with the tenderest sympathy for human frailty and sustain us with faith in the final triumph of the right. Merciful God, constantly abide with those who carry great sorrows. Bless any of our officers and Members who may be in distress; give them courage and hope, that they may trace the rainbow through the rain. Comfort the shattered home about which our country is pouring its fervent prayers; do Thou answer them. May the parents be fed no longer with the bread of tears. Strike down the dull, hardened, and blackened souls of the killers and the robbers of life, and let righteousness and justice have their way. In Thy holy name. Amen.

PENSIONS

Mr. GASQUE. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 9575) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and so forth, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina calls up a bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to make a preliminary inquiry of the gentleman from South Carolina. Will the gentleman inform the House as to the policy his committee is following in recommending favorable reports on private pension bills, and particularly as to whether the persons who are listed for pensions are already receiving pensions? In providing pensions and increase of pensions, what general policy is followed in granting the preferment of the Government to certain persons as listed in the omnibus bill?

Mr. GASQUE. I will state to the gentleman that the committee, as he probably already knows, acts on cases which can not come under the general law. In other words, it acts in the capacity of an equity court where cases are shut out by some technical point in the law.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, as I understand from the gentleman's statement, it would not be possible to include these cases in any general law?

Mr. GASQUE. It would not.

Mr. STAFFORD. There are numerous instances where we have increased the pensions of widows of soldiers who served in certain wars who are now receiving pensions which could be covered by a general law. I am fundamentally opposed to special legislation which gives a preferred status to any individual. I favor general legislation, and I am seeking information as to whether it is possible, in connection with the cases which the gentleman's committee reports favorably, to have a general law rather than special laws giving preferment to selected individuals.

Mr. GASQUE. I agree with the gentleman. I think a general law covering most of these cases could be passed, but it has not yet been worked out.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, that is very important information. The gentleman states it might be possible to cover these cases by a general law?

Mr. GASQUE. To cover most of the cases, but not all of them.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think it would be highly proper to have general legislation covering these cases rather than to have them appeal to Members for special consideration, and the gentleman's committee has jurisdiction over general legislation.

Mr. GASQUE. The committee is working along those lines in attempting to arrive at some legislation that would cover a large majority of these cases.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman give us any hope that at this session legislation will be reported from his committee that will cover these cases by general legislation rather than by specially designating them?

Mr. GASQUE. I might state for the benefit of the gentleman that the committee has already reported a bill granting uniform pensions to the widows and dependent children of all wars, which makes a beginning. I have never believed that the widows of any one war should be given preference over the widows of another war. My committee now has a bill, H. R. 7230, known as the uniform widows' pension bill, on the calendar, which I hope the gentleman will help us pass.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the policy of the committee as to the granting of original pensions to members of the Regular Army, including those who served in Indian wars?

Mr. GASQUE. The only bills we have reported with regard to veterans of the Indian wars are such as I mentioned in the beginning—cases in which they can not quite comply with the law, but almost comply with it. I might state that a subcommittee of my committee is now considering a number of Indian war bills in an effort to arrive at some method of unifying them and putting all of the Indian war veterans on the same basis.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has furnished the information I desired, and I withdraw the reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what bill is this?

Mr. GASQUE. It is an omnibus pension bill.

Mr. RANKIN. This is a bill providing special pensions in individual cases?

Mr. GASQUE. Yes; it is an omnibus pension bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill.

BABIES AND DADDIES

Mr. NELSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, because of the great sorrow that has come to the Lindbergh home the whole Nation is thinking of parent and child love; and in this connection I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an article which I wrote some 20 years ago on the subject "Babies and Daddies."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

The article is as follows:

This is about babies. It is, in fact, mainly about one very small baby. At this springtime and Eastertide we have on our farm calves, colts, lambs, pigs—yes, and downy-coated chicks; but it is not of these little creatures that we write. Our thoughts turn to the farm's best crop—children. You have no baby and are not interested in these pink-toed bits of humanity that cry and "coo"? But you were once somebody's baby, and somebody—yes, two "somebodies"—thought you a perfectly wonderful child. If in your home you have a baby, a real bouncing boy, you address him something like this: "Hello, old man!" "Howdy, partner!" "How do you do, fine fellow?" "Good morning, good man," or "How's my mannie man?" All the time you are gaily gesticulating and going through more motions than were ever thought of by a movie maker. And it is a paid performance that you are giving, for the smile and laugh—ever notice how babies laugh, even with their eyes?—that baby gives us is better by far than gold. Yes; and there is music sweeter than ever came from a Stradivarius or the melody of murmuring brook—a baby's laugh.

There is a language of Babyland. It is a language that parents only can understand. Babies alone can speak it, but all fathers and mothers try. No mere linguist, however learned, has succeeded in any attempt to reduce it to the printed page; nor for the shortest word is there so much as a suitable symbol, for the smile, the smile that no camera ever yet has caught, is a part of this language of love. To be sure baby, your baby, can talk to you and make you understand. He tells you things that he tells none other—none other, save mother. He knows not words, yet his are the sweetest of stories—and again and again perchance you say as you hug him tighter in your arms or toss him higher in the air, "Dat's fine; tell fahdie 'nother story."

When evening comes and the work of the day is done, you draw the window shades or close the shutters and say half to yourself and half to your little son, "Good night, Mr. Day."

Just why we do not know, but babies take us into the Kingdom of Make-believe, where live fancies and fairies. After you have held baby up so that he may stretch his little legs and "dance a set," his restless "footsies" being allowed barely to touch your lap, lest he be bowlegged, you talk to him about going to "Sleepy House." Or if he is strong enough you give him a ride on your foot while you dream of your youth and of stick horses (stick horses of children become the staffs of old age) and plan how, later, you will buy him a pony so that he may ride with you over the farm.

When little eyes are heavy with sleep mother takes "the man" as he goes to slumber land. Comes your own bedtime, and you look to see if all is well with the little sleeper. Then, it may be that you notice a smile play over a very small face tinted like the sea shell, and you wonder if he is talking with the angels—yes; and at that moment you feel that heaven must be very near. As you look there comes to mind the words:

"Here is my past and present; yea, and here
The days that shall be counted my hereafter;
Here is my sweetest and my bitterest tear,
And here my laughter."

Did you ever feel the touch of a baby's hand, your own baby's hand, chubby, soft, and velvety? Did baby's hands, the little hands of your own baby, ever pat you tenderly and lovingly on your cheeks? Magical almost is the touch of a baby's hand. The little fingers clasp your own big ones and lead you into a world, the existence of which you never before knew. Or gently and confidingly a hand almost too small to seem real is placed in your own. Then it is, for the first time, you know the meaning of "a little child shall lead them."

Baby brings out the best that is in us. If, at this Easter time, you in your heart hold hatred for some fellow man who seems rough and unfeeling, you would forgive if you could but see and hear him in his own home and with his baby on his knee.

It is a fine thing after you have come in from the field to see, as your near the house, a little nose pressed against the window pane until it seems only a tiny round spot. What if there are fingerprints on the glass? Who cares, when a pair of little hands are upheld to his? Or baby may be in his little bed or buggy and gaily pounding his rattle. You hear it and somehow your feet carry you in that direction and your arms reach down, when up comes "the fellow." Then, although you may not be able to distinguish America from Dixie, you attempt to imitate the band or to sing.

Some babies, they say, are a bit spoiled and bad, but nobody ever had such a baby in his own home. A few fathers are perfectly foolish, too, they say, but never was there a fond father who felt that he was "perfectly foolish" over his baby. His baby is different—to him. Take him up when he frets? Why not? Maybe the little fellow is sick, has the "tummy" ache, or is going to cut a "toofie." It doesn't seem strange that the dreadful pain goes away when he is up in papa's lap and at the table. "There, look, mamma, look! Did you see that? Boy put his hand in the custard and quick as a wink his little fingers went into his mouth. Wasn't that smart of the little rascal? Not many babies like him, bless his heart. See how he is still sucking his thumb?" No; that was not somebody else's baby.

All babies are clever. Each has his own special repertoire of clever tricks. What father has there ever been who did not enjoy watching baby in his effort to get his toe into his mouth, and what mother who did not pick him up and hug and kiss him when he succeeded? A wonderful thing is a baby. He drives away "the blues" and lets in the sunshine.

Babies all, bless 'em. One day, too soon it will seem, they will leave the home nest for the wonder world without. Back on the old farm father and mother may be left alone. Yet on Easter Day and other days as they see the world through the eyes of a son, the baby of the yesteryears, they will find joy in this thought:

"The glory age, be it understood,
Is a boy out there who is making good."

BRIDGE ACROSS THE RAINY RIVER, MINN.

Mr. MILLIGAN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 5064) authorizing Vernon W. O'Connor, of St. Paul, Minn., his heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Rainy River at or near Baudette, Minn., with a Senate amendment, and move to concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

"The said Vernon W. O'Connor, his successors or assigns, shall within 90 days after the completion of the bridge constructed under the authority of this act file with the Secretary of War an itemized statement under oath showing the actual original cost of such bridge and its approaches and appurtenances, which statement shall include any expenditures actually made for engineering and legal services; and any fees, discounts, and other expenditures actually incurred in connection with the financing thereof. Such itemized statement of cost shall be investigated by the Secretary of War at any time within three years after the completion of such bridge, and for that purpose the said Vernon W. O'Connor, his successors or assigns, in such manner as may be deemed proper, shall make available and accessible all records connected with the construction and financing of such bridge, and the findings of the Secretary of War as to the actual cost of such bridge shall be made a part of the records of the War Department."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLIGAN. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. I noticed when I read the Senate amendment it was rather different in phraseology and policy from what we have heretofore incorporated in bridge bills. Will the gentleman kindly inform the House of the reason he is moving to adopt the Senate amendment?

Mr. MILLIGAN. For the reason this is an international bridge, and the committee was of the opinion that it was better to exclude the general provision that is included in bridge bills, because it would be necessary, by treaty, to make provisions relative to the bridge, due to the fact it is international in character; but the Senate was of a different opinion and insisted that this amendment should go in the bill, and the amendment was placed on the bill in the Senate.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman states the Senate insisted. I thought when this bill came over on yesterday the gentleman would ask for a conference on the Senate amendment, but the gentleman is now moving to accept the amendment without any conference.

Mr. MILLIGAN. Yes; and I may say that I advised with the Senator who had the bill in charge before it was passed by the Senate.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to have the gentleman yield so that the gentleman from Minnesota, who is deeply interested in this bill, because it is in his district, may explain the reason why we depart from the general policy in the amendment proposed by the Senate, if the gentleman knows.

Mr. KNUTSON. I may say to the gentleman that I conferred with the Senator who insisted on this amendment. Of course, personally, I can not see the necessity for it, but the Senator thought it should go into the bill, and rather than delay the matter any longer I accepted the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Was this at the insistence of the junior or senior Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. KNUTSON. It was at the insistence of the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG].

Mr. STAFFORD. He thought it was a good policy to be adopted generally or only in connection with this international bridge bill?

Mr. MILLIGAN. In connection with this particular bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman will notice that this itemization of cost is to be investigated by the Secretary of War at any time within three years. Of course, we know that is a mere formality that will rarely, if ever, be undertaken by the Secretary of War. It is simply an idle gesture.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLIGAN. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is, as the gentleman says, a gesture; but when abuses do take place they have appealed, and in one instance, they had quite an extensive hearing on the rates.

Mr. KNUTSON. And it helps determine the toll that should be charged, I may say to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri to concur in the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

DEPENDENTS OF WORLD WAR VETERANS

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I have filed with the Clerk of the House a petition to bring out of the Rules Committee the bill (H. R. 8578) for the relief of the widows, orphans, and dependent parents of deceased veterans of the World War, and at this point I ask unanimous consent to insert the bill in the RECORD.

The bill is as follows:

A bill to amend the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended, by providing allowances for widows and children and dependent parents of veterans of the World War

Be it enacted, etc., That section 201 of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended (U. S. C., title 38, sec. 472), be hereby amended by adding at the end thereof a new subdivision to read as follows:

"(8) Where any honorably discharged ex-service man who entered the service prior to November 11, 1918, and served 90 days or more during the World War dies of a disability not acquired in the service the following monthly allowances shall be paid:

"(a) If the deceased leaves a widow without means of support other than her daily labor and actual net income not exceeding $250 per year who was his wife and living with him not less than five years next before his death or who married him prior to January 1, 1925, $20;

"(b) If the deceased leaves a widow and one child without means of support other than her daily labor and actual net income not exceeding $400 per year; $26, with $6 for each additional child;

"(c) If the deceased leaves no widow but one child, $20, with $6 for each additional child: Provided, That no child shall be permitted to draw this allowance who has an actual net income exceeding $400 per year;

"(d) If the deceased leaves a dependent father or mother who has reached the age of 65 years, $15, or both, $20. Such allowance shall be payable whether the dependency of the father or mother, or both, arose before or arises after the death of the ex-service man;

"(e) The payment of allowance for a widow shall continue until her death or remarriage;

"(f) The payment of allowance to or for a child shall continue until such child reaches the age of 16 years or marries, or if such child be permanently incapable of self-support by reason of mental or physical defect, then during such incapacity.

"(g) Whenever the allowance payable to or for the benefit of any person under the provisions of this subdivision is terminated by the happening of the contingency upon which it is limited, the allowance thereafter for the remaining beneficiary or beneficiaries, if any, shall be the amount which would have been payable to them if they had been the sole original beneficiaries;

"(h) As between the widow and the children not in her custody and as between children, the amount of allowance shall be apportioned as may be prescribed by regulations;

"(i) No allowance under this subdivision shall commence prior to the date of the passage of this amendatory act or the date of application therefor, and such application shall be in such form as the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs may prescribe."

Mr. RANKIN. This measure is one that should have been passed years ago. If what was called the Rankin bill a few years ago had become law, these widows and orphans and dependent parents would have automatically gone on the roll, but when that bill was vetoed and the disability allowance bill was passed the widows, orphans, and dependent parents were left out.

This bill is not exactly what we want. But under the circumstances it is the best we could get. In fact, there has been a good deal of pressure brought to bear to take from the veterans at least a part of what they are now receiving; and, of course, those who assume that attitude as a rule are opposed to any additional relief.

Veterans are criticizing the "needs" clause in this bill. I am not responsible for that provision. It was inserted in the committee. When the bill comes to the floor of the House, an amendment will be offered to strike the "needs" clause out. So that criticism ought not to be used to keep the bill from coming to the House for final passage.

Some criticism—and in my opinion the most unjust and unreasonable criticism—has been made because of the fact that we propose to take care of the dependent parents of those veterans who have passed away.

John Thomas Taylor sent a letter out over the country asking veterans to write you to strike these dependent parents from the bill. That would be the most unjust, the most cruel, and the most inhuman step that Congress could take.

I am going to show you why. The bill provides that none of these aged parents are to go on the roll unless their soldier son is dead and they were actually dependent on him. It only provides the small pittance of $15 a month for one and $20 for two of these old people, who sent their son to defend the country in times of war and who in their helpless old age are unable to care for themselves as a result of his passing away.

The cost of this provision has been greatly exaggerated. Let me show you what it will cost. It will cost only about $860,000 a year. It is limited to those above 65 years of age. Their average length of life will be less than seven years. They are rapidly passing away. They are dying faster than the veterans themselves. The cost of this provision will in all probability grow less with each passing year.

The gold-star mothers are for this provision of the bill. The World War mothers are for it. The rank and file of the American Legion are for it, and so are the Veterans of Foreign Wars and the Disabled American Veterans of the World War.

You talk about the people who suffered in the World War. There was no suffering more intense than that of the aged father and mother who gave their son to the cause—that son upon whose manly shoulders they had hoped to lean for support and protection in their declining years, and who has now passed away, leaving them penniless in their infirm old age, and that in the midst of the greatest depression this country has ever seen.

The very least we can do is to give them the relief provided in this bill and help to drive from their doors the wolf of poverty in their declining years.

I hope that every Member of the House will sign the petition to bring this bill to the floor of the House for early consideration and that it will pass the House and the Senate by a unanimous vote. [Applause.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest and a great deal of sympathy to the statement just made by my distinguished friend and colleague from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN]. The filing of a petition at the Clerk's desk, of which he gave notice, brings up in a concrete form some of the practical difficulties that confront the Committee on Rules in undertaking to bring out legislation for consideration of the House. I assure my friend from Mississippi and all Members of the House that there is no disposition whatever to refuse a rule for the consideration of this veterans' legislation. I think I am in position to assure him that such a rule will be granted at an early date. The delay in the measure—and I acquainted my friend from Mississippi with these facts before he made his statement—is because of the difficulties that are presented to the Committee on Rules as well as to the leadership of the House in the fact that there is now pending before the Committee on Rules a request from the Committee on Pensions which sets up an entirely different measure of pensions for the veterans of the World War than that suggested by the bills sponsored by the gentleman from Mississippi. There is no real conflict between me and the gentleman from Mississippi or the Rules Committee on the major proposition of bringing in a rule for consideration of pension legislation. In the interest of orderly legislation we thought it advisable to see if it would not be possible before any action was taken to reconcile these two legislative measures. The Committee on Pensions has jurisdiction to bring out a pension bill. They have done so, affecting the payment of pensions to World War veterans and other veterans. My friend from Mississippi and his committee have reported out a bill dealing exclusively with World War veterans, so that in all fairness, in all reason, I do not think my friend from Mississippi has just cause for complaint because of the fact that the matter has been pending before our committee for a short time and we have not acted upon it. There is no disposition to throttle the consideration of his measure, and I feel justified in making this statement, because, of course, the filing of the petition to discharge the Committee on Rules is in its very nature a criticism of the committee or of its delay in that matter; and if Members of the House, in view of the facts that I have presented, feel justified in asking to discharge the committee, I shall not resent it. It would not offend the Committee on Rules.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. POU. In view of the efforts that the Committee on Rules has been putting forth from day to day to reconcile the differences of these measures that have been mentioned here, does not the gentleman from Alabama think it is a little bit previous to attempt to club the Committee on Rules at this time?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I would not like to answer that question in terms, because I do not want to get into a controversy with my good friend and colleague from Mississippi. He knows that I am in sympathy with bringing out a rule at an early date for the consideration of this legislation.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. Instead of my criticizing the Committee on Rules, it seems that I am being criticized by the Committee on Rules. I offered no criticism of the Committee on Rules, but the bill that the gentleman refers to, which is before the committee, carries with it more than three times the amount of the expenditure that this bill carries. Besides, in my honest opinion, the Pensions Committee had no right to infringe upon the jurisdiction of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs by attempting to handle World War veterans' legislation. In addition, that bill covers widows of Spanish War veterans that the Veterans' Committee is precluded from handling, and in addition to that brings in Civil War widows. That brings several elements into the contest that I would prefer not to see mixed up in legislation on World War veterans' affairs.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, instead of trying to embarrass the Committee on Rules, if the gentleman will investigate it carefully, he will see that I am doing the Rules Committee a favor.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I am not impugning the motives of my friend from Mississippi, who will understand that, but the very statement he has made with reference to the conflict in the jurisdiction of these two bills and the difference in these bills illustrates the difficulty that is presented to the Committee on Rules. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. GASQUE] is chairman of a committee of the House of equal dignity and standing to the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation, and he has requested the Committee on Rules to give him a hearing, and it has been decided to give him a hearing to-morrow on his bill. The Rules Committee wants to act with reasonable dispatch in these measures. There is a rather grave responsibility that rests upon that committee, particularly in a matter of this sort, where confusion will necessarily arise out of these two conflicting measures, unless they can be reconciled. I understand they can not. Therefore, if I may be permitted to speak what I think is the sentiment of the Committee on Rules, within a very few days we will bring out a rule that will throw this whole question squarely before the House of Representatives.

Mr. GASQUE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield, that I may interrogate the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. GASQUE. The gentleman from Mississippi stated that the Committee on Pensions had overstepped its authority in bringing in a pension bill for World War veterans.

Mr. RANKIN. No; the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. GASQUE. Is not the measure that the gentleman's committee has reported in reality a pension bill?

Mr. RANKIN. In reality they are all pension bills, whether you call them retirement pay, compensation, allowance, or pension.

Mr. GASQUE. Why did not the gentleman call it a pension in the case of his bill, and then it would naturally have come to the Committee on Pensions?

Mr. RANKIN. The World War Veterans' Legislation Committee has never referred to it as a pension. They have called it disability allowance and compensation.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman state how this could have been abolished?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Was my colleague here when I made my preliminary statement?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I undertook to explain to the membership that this delay was caused by reason of there appearing before our committee two bills from committees having somewhat concurrent jurisdiction on this question, and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. GASQUE] had not had an opportunity to appear before the Committee on Rules in support of his resolution. We thought it nothing but fair to wait until fair consideration could be given to the bill proposed by him, inasmuch as it involves identically, in part, the same subject matter as the bill presented by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

Mr. COX. And the Rules Committee threw out the suggestion to the gentleman that they collaborate on the separate bills and reach some agreement.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; but I stated that it was apparent that could not be done.

Mr. Speaker, that is all I care to say on the subject.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

RELIEF OF INDIANS IN DISTRESS

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to prefer a unanimous-consent request on behalf of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PEAVEY], who is unavoidably absent.

I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PEAVEY] be permitted to extend his remarks and to incorporate therein a resolution adopted by the House Committee on Indian Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. PEAVEY. Mr. Speaker, under authority to extend remarks in the RECORD, granted on the request of Chairman HOWARD, of the Indian Affairs Committee of the House, last Saturday, I insert in the RECORD copy of the resolution referred to.

The resolution is as follows:

Whereas due to crop failures, unemployment, recent blizzards, and the exhaustion of Indian tribal funds there now exists a state of acute and growing distress, amounting in thousands of cases to gradual starvation among Indians in at least 10 States, and not fewer than 125,000 in number; and

Whereas the facts are known to the Interior Department and Bureau of Indian Affairs through numerous letters and telegrams from the superintendents in the files of the Indian Office; and

Whereas it has been the policy of the administrative branch to withhold distress relief from these Indians administratively classed as nonwards, although the majority of such Indians are in fact still living in tribal relations, are still interested in tribal property, funds, or claims, or still subsisting under treaty relations with the Government, these Indians thus denied Federal aid numbering not fewer than 50,000; and

Whereas the American Red Cross is extending aid to these so-called nonward Indians in four States only (Montana, North Dakota, South Dakota, and Nebraska), and in the total amount of only $50,000 between this date and July 1, while the so-called nonward Indians in all other States, including Oklahoma, Wisconsin, Nevada, and California, are denied aid alike by the Red Cross and the Federal Government; and

Whereas for all the so-called ward Indians of the country the Bureau of Indian Affairs has now only $95,000 for the distress relief for the balance of the fiscal year 1932, and is requesting only $135,000 in addition, or a total of $230,000 for not fewer than 75,000 so-called ward Indians in distress; and

Whereas the Indian tribes of the Southwest have already lost through starvation following a series of blizzards 200,000 or more of their sheep, and will lose during the month of March a greatly increased number unless feeding of the sheep can be provided at once, and the self-support of these tribes is dependent on their sheep; and

Whereas the Department of Agriculture has under its control funds which could be made available for the feeding of sheep and livestock belonging to Indians and for the rehabilitation of Indian farmers, but is not in a position to take the initiative, and must wait on initiative from the Secretary of the Interior: Therefore be it

Resolved, First, that this committee declare its judgment that the denial of relief to the so-called nonward Indians in distress by the Federal Government is contrary to the body of statute laws affecting Indians and contrary to the declaration of the Supreme Court as to Federal responsibility toward the Indians, and, in addition, does not properly follow from any ruling from the Comptroller General of the United States, and this committee strongly holds to the opinion that the United States is bound by legal as well as moral obligations to help these so-called nonward Indians, numbering not fewer than 50,000. Such distress relief for so-called nonward Indians is provided in the bill H. R. 8498, pending before this committee, which bill proposes to make use of the local agencies of Government in the distribution of distress relief in line with the policy of the Secretary of the Interior, as embodied in the pending bill, H. R. 227, S. 3110, now pending before this committee.

Second. That it is the judgment of this committee that a total fund of $230,000 for all so-called nonward Indians in distress in the whole country from this date until the end of the fiscal year is a totally inadequate sum, being $5 for each Indian in distress.

Third. That it is the judgment of this committee that steps should be taken at once to make available to the Navajo, Apache, and Zuni Indians, and to any other Indians similarly situated, the funds under the control of the Department of Agriculture available for stock feed, and that the Department of the Interior should take steps without further delay to enlist the fullest cooperation of the Department of Agriculture.

HUBERT H. PEAVEY.

Adopted by the Indian Affairs Committee of the House by a unanimous vote, Wednesday, March 2, 1932.

Mr. Speaker, this resolution refers specifically to two classes of dependent Indians. The first article of the resolution provides for the relief of some 50,000 or more Indians known as nonward Indians. This includes Indians who have received their allotments and who, by the several acts of Congress and the administration of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, have been turned loose in the various sections and communities of the counties in which they live, and who, due to their previous tribal character and ignorance of the white man's methods of making a living, are now destitute and are being supported by charity of the towns and counties where they reside.

This nonward Indian question is one of serious proportions to the towns and counties of the States having Indian residents. Most of these towns charge that by the Government's failure to provide for and maintain these Indians it has forced this liability upon the people of the towns and counties where the Indians live. By every rule of law and reason, it is a Federal liability that should be carried out by the Federal Government, but in fact and in practice it is now being carried by the taxpayers of the towns and counties mentioned.

The passage of H. R. 8498 would provide relief for these nonward Indians in the amount of 50 per cent of the amount so paid for the Indians by the several towns and counties affected. It affords relief not only to the Indians but to the taxpayers and officials of the towns and counties affected. Many of these towns and counties, due to the present economic conditions, are themselves in serious financial straits. Most of their taxable land areas have gone delinquent in the past three or four years, and people living in many of these localities are themselves dependent upon their communities for aid and sustenance.

The second class of Indians affected in this resolution are known as ward Indians who for the most part live on the reservation and are under the direct control and authority of the Federal Government and who receive direct allotments or payments from the tribal funds. Many of these tribes of Indians, owing to the depleted state of their tribal funds, have no money or means with which to live and support their families. An appropriation of $230,000 is provided for this class under the resolution.

The third article of the resolution provides or makes available to the Navajo and other Indians similarly situated funds that are already available to the Department of Agriculture for livestock, feed, and so forth. Mr. Speaker, more than 25 States of the Union are directly affected by this resolution.

In Wisconsin we have many tribes of Indians. I have three reservations in my congressional district—Bad River at Odanah, Lac du Flambeau, and Reserve—and in addition there are the abandoned Indians of Red Cliff at Bayfield, Wis., and the Lost Band of Chippewas at Webster. There are in addition many hundred scattered Indians. There are more than 100 towns in eight counties directly concerned with feeding and clothing these Indians. It is not Christian-like for the white man to permit his Indian neighbor to starve or freeze.

In closing I want to say that unless the funds specified in the three paragraphs of this resolution are made available that literally thousands of men, women, and children of more than one-quarter Indian blood will perish within the coming year. Starvation for themselves and starvation for the small amount of livestock that some of these Indians still possess is facing them at this time. I sincerely hope that Congress will act speedily in providing the emergency relief sought in this resolution.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I find there are so many gentlemen who are anxious to go on record either for or against the anti-injunction bill, mostly for it, and who can not be here to-morrow, that it would be better to take that up on Tuesday next, immediately after the reading of the Journal, under the rule. In order to expedite the business of the House and general debate on the independent offices appropriation bill, I desire to ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow, and that when the House adjourns on Monday next it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock on Tuesday.

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, as I understand, all that will be laid before the House to-morrow will be general debate on the independent offices appropriation bill?

Mr. RAINEY. That is all. Of course, if general debate should be concluded, which does not seem likely, then we will proceed under the 5-minute rule on that bill, but there will be no vote on that bill to-morrow.

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, with regard to the anti-injunction bill, there are some in the House who are against curtailing the present power and jurisdiction of our courts. Are we to be given a fair division of time in the discussion of that bill?

Mr. RAINEY. The gentleman will have to take that up with others than myself.

Mr. BLANTON. But the rule does not provide that.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. There is no rule yet actually drafted.

Mr. BLANTON. But I mean the rule that the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The idea of the Rules Committee is to give free debate on both sides.

Mr. BLANTON. And there will be equal division of time by those who are against as well as those who are for the measure?

Mr. O'CONNOR. That is my understanding of the attitude of the Rules Committee.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as I understand, the gentleman from Illinois proposes to allow the independent offices appropriation bill to have right of way after the present bill is finished?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. WOODRUM. Through to-morrow?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUM. And when will we have an opportunity to consider that bill again after to-morrow?

Mr. RAINEY. On Monday afternoon, if they get through with the Consent Calendar.

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman will perceive that we start out on a bill such as the independent offices appropriation bill, which provides appropriations for 30 different governmental agencies, and which has some controversial subjects in it, and it is going to be very hard on the committee and on the House if we split it up. I wonder if the gentleman would ask unanimous consent to dispense with Calendar Wednesday, so that we could go ahead with that bill and complete it on Wednesday or Thursday?

Mr. RAINEY. That would be impossible. Of course, there would be objection. Calendar Wednesday could not be dispensed with except by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman is assuming there would be objection. There may not be. Under the gentleman's proposal now we will not finish general debate on this appropriation bill to-morrow, and we will not get to it again until Thursday of next week. That is the effect of it.

Mr. RAINEY. It may be possible to consider it again on Monday.

Mr. WOODRUM. It is obvious that Monday is Consent Calendar, and Tuesday the anti-injunction bill will be considered, and Wednesday Calendar Wednesday, so that we will go from Saturday until next Thursday.

Mr. RAINEY. I would not care to propound such a request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

TREASURY AND POST OFFICE DEPARTMENTS APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9699) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Treasury and Post Office Departments appropriation bill, with Mr. HOWARD in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the inland transportation of mail by aircraft, under contract as authorized by law, and for the incidental expenses thereof, including not to exceed $30,000 for supervisory officials and clerks at air mail transfer points, and not to exceed $41,780 for personal services in the District of Columbia and incidental and travel expenses, $19,000,000.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia: On page 57, line 25, strike out the sign and figures "$19,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof the sign and figures "$20,000,000."

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I am not fooling myself and I am sure I am not fooling any Member of this House when I say that the amendment I have offered has about as much chance to get the approval of the Appropriations Committee as a militant Chinaman would have on the streets of Tokyo.

However, I want to show you this picture. I want you to consider it because you are the custodians of the Treasury and you are the ones to decide it.

I have the greatest respect for the Appropriations Committee and they are doing fine work. I usually stand with them. I stand with them very often when it hurts; but when there is a good thing which they do not approve, I do not stand with them, and I submit this is a good thing. I want to ask your careful consideration of it for a few minutes.

If you are not familiar with this airplane map, I think it might be interesting to say that here is a very beautiful picture, a very fine picture. If you do not know about it, you would be surprised to see how much development there has been in the air mail service of this country. I think the Postmaster General has done a fine piece of work, but there are some missing links in this picture, and with $19,000,000 this can not be completed. Year by year expenses are being reduced as the mail increases, and the Postmaster General says that within three years he thinks these lines can get along without any assistance or very little assistance.

It is very important to connect these missing links so as to bring this service up to as high a standard as possible, and with this additional $1,000,000 I am sure that can be done. There are several connecting links that affect this entire situation. Here is one from Troy to Montreal and another from Richmond to Hampton Roads and from Washington to Hampton Roads. Here is one from Washington down to Nashville, through this great central portion of West Virginia, Kentucky, and Tennessee. Here is one from New Orleans to this point [indicating on map]. Here are two from the southern point of Florida connecting the West Indies. Here is one across the State of Texas. Here is one up in Washington to Victoria.

I am not going to discuss these other points because other gentlemen who are interested will do that. We have been before the Appropriations Committee and we have been before the Budget. I can not speak for either one of them but I do not believe that either one would seriously object if this were done.

At Hampton Roads we have a great population—400,000 people—and one of the greatest ports in the country. There are an average of 10 or 12 ships that come there every day, large ocean liners. They want to get their mail to all parts of the country. The bankers there tell me that they will be able to save $200,000 a year by getting their paper to New York quickly, as can be done by air mail. Lights have been installed from Washington to Norfolk by the Department of Commerce. We have two air lines there, but no air mail. Ship captains come in every day and are amazed that there is no way of getting their mail out of Hampton Roads by air routes.

Here is an extension that should be made from Washington down through this large section, one of the largest sections on the map that is not touched. It reaches right into the city of Nashville, the home city of the gentleman from Tennessee, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. Of course, his hands are tied and he is not going to set a precedent, but I think we should take it out of his hands and establish it, and by doing that we would be performing a very graceful act for him. It would be a very graceful thing if we should establish a line into his home city.

Mr. STAFFORD. Even over his protest?

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Yes; even over his protest, as the gentleman from Wisconsin suggests. I think it would be a very graceful thing to do for him.

Going back to this situation here at Hampton Roads, last year one of the reasons given for this additional $2,000,000 was that this line was to be established. The city has gone ahead and established an airport. Two lines have come in there and there is tremendous traffic around that port. It is the second largest port in America. More coal, tobacco, and cotton are shipped out of that port than from any other port in the country.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. I do not want to be selfish about it and there are other Members who will tell you about their problems. We are all interested in it. As I say, we have been before the Appropriations Committee and before the Budget. Last year one of the reasons for this additional $2,000,000 was that this line was to be established. The committee was going to give them $18,000,000, but the Post Office Department asked for $20,000,000. One of the reasons given for this additional $2,000,000 was that this route was to be established from Washington to Norfolk. As the result of that, as I say, lights were established all along the way and those lights are there now. Lights have been established by the Department of Commerce over the entire route.

Depending on that, the city established an airport, and two air lines are connecting Washington and Norfolk at this time—one the Ludington line coming here direct from Washington and the Eastern Air Transport coming from Richmond. It does not make any difference to us which one gets it, but we do want air mail service.

The bankers have told me that they would save $200,000 a year in getting their paper from Norfolk to New York where it is cleared.

You will notice that this entire coast line here [indicating] is not served with air mail, but is cut off entirely, and here at Hampton Roads we have one of the greatest ports in the United States. Frequently we have 18 or 20 ocean steamers a day coming in there from all parts of the world, and the postmaster told me a few days ago that they come in and express amazement that they can not get their mail and their invoices and other important papers to other parts of the country by air mail. The overhead cost on some of these ships is $2,500 a day, and a delay of one day is tremendously important to them.

Mr. GARBER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. GARBER. What is the distance of that route and what would be the approximate cost?

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. I am glad the gentleman has asked that question. The distance from Richmond to Norfolk is probably 60 miles and the cost would be something like $70,000 a year. The distance from Washington to Norfolk is 120 miles and I think the cost would be $150,000 a year, only a nominal sum.

I do not want to criticize the Post Office Department, but as I say, they secured this money last year and this is one of the reasons they gave for it. Frequently that is done. I know that other Members of the House have had a similar experience. The department gets the money for one purpose and then spends it for another.

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. FLANNAGAN. If the appropriation is increased, will the air route from Washington by way of Charlottesville and Roanoke and Bristol to Nashville be put in?

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. My understanding is it would be, but I would not like to say definitely about that. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. LOVETTE] is going to speak about that in a few minutes and will tell the gentleman about that. I think the gentleman has some understanding about it, and I would rather that he advise the gentleman about that. However, I understand that is true.

So, as I have said, the money was appropriated for this purpose, and yet we have not the route, and now these lines are running and we need the establishment of this air mail route. The cost will be a very small matter.

Mr. LANHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. LANHAM. Even if the gentleman's amendment should not prevail, will the $19,000,000 provided for in this bill insure the continuance of every route now in existence in its full efficiency?

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. With the $19,000,000?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. I understand it will, but it will not give them room for any extensions. It will barely keep the present routes going.

Mr. LANHAM. Is it absolutely certain it will do that?

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. I think it is. That is my understanding of it.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Has the gentleman any authority for making that statement in so far as the route from Los Angeles to Salt Lake and Denver and in that western country is concerned; that is, that the arrangements that have been completed in the last 90 days are not going to be corrected if they get only the $19,000,000?

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. I have not any authority to speak about that. I do not know about that.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Do not say it, then.

Mr. LARSEN. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. LARSEN. My understanding is that the testimony of the Postmaster General before the subcommittee was to the effect that if the appropriation remained at $19,000,000 this would necessitate the cutting down of 5 per cent of the amount that is now being paid to the transportation companies, and he said that, considering the fact he had just had a 10 per cent cut, he did not think it practicable or feasible, and that it ought not to be done.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANHAM. If the gentleman will yield, in view of the statement made by the gentleman from Georgia, is it not doubtful that the $19,000,000 provided for in this bill will be sufficient to enable the existing lines to run at full efficiency?

Mr. LARSEN. The Postmaster General said distinctly it would not enable him to do it; that he could not proceed with the $19,000,000 in the way he should proceed, as I understood his testimony.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I have one concluding statement to make, and I appreciate very much the time you have given me.

Let me call your attention to the fact that this is a decreasing expense. Every year the mail and passenger service is increasing so that the cost can be reduced more and more, and the Postmaster General states that in about three years most of these lines will be self-sustaining.

Mr. LUDLOW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. LUDLOW. The question has been raised here as to whether this $19,000,000 will be sufficient to sustain the present service——

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. The Post Office Department wants $20,000,000, and we want $20,000,000, but they have been limited to $19,000,000.

Mr. LUDLOW. I would like to clear up some misapprehension that may exist here. When Mr. Glover was before the committee, as a member of the subcommittee I asked him this question:

> Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Glover, under this $19,000,000 appropriation you expect to be able to maintain the existing service, do you?
> Mr. GLOVER. Yes, sir.
> Mr. LUDLOW. And if there is any change at all, it will be in the frequency of service, curtailing of service?
> Mr. GLOVER. If we have to curtail it at all, it would be in the frequency of the service.

His answer leaves no doubt whatever that $19,000,000 will sustain all of the existing air mail routes during the next fiscal year, and there is even doubt as to whether in any single instance there will be any curtailment in the frequency of the service.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Under the guise of having insufficient funds, or for some other reason, the service from

Los Angeles to Denver by Salt Lake or by Albuquerque and thence easterly has been made such a service that it is absolutely useless as air mail service, and if that service is to be continued, it might just as well be cut out and any money saved in connection with cutting out that service might be used at some other place, unless they are going to correct the present service.

Mr. LUDLOW. From the statement of Mr. Glover, there need not be any misapprehension in the mind of any gentleman of the House that the existing service will be cut out. In these times of general distress we must pay some heed to the condition of the Treasury and to the interests of the overburdened taxpayers. Not a single air mail route in this country will be discontinued if this bill passes.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, there are other Members who are interested in different sections of the country, and I am going to yield to them now. I appreciate very much the opportunity you have given me.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Will the gentleman kindly give the names of the cities proposed to be served by this extension and state whether or not they now have airports?

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. I will put that in the RECORD. I can not point it out on the map, as the print is too small.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes beyond the allotted time. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Chairman, I may say in the beginning of the remarks that I make on this matter that it has been my honor to serve as a member of the Post Office Committee of the House for the past several years, during which time the Watres bill, under which existing air mail is now carried, was reported out of that committee and passed by this Congress.

If there is anything in connection with the Watres bill that was intended to be emphasized it was to sell commercial aviation to the people of America.

Since the passage of that bill the Postmaster General has undertaken, I believe in a very splendid, efficient way, to put over that idea because of that legislation.

Now, what has happened in the last two or three years? Since the passage of the Watres bill aviation has taken great strides throughout America.

I have some statistics here which I desire to call to your attention. In 1930 there was a total of 21,353 air mail miles in America. In 1931 there were 26,553 air mail miles, or an increase of over 5,000 air line miles covered by the air mail.

There was an average daily schedule of 62,349 miles in 1930 and 95,121 miles in 1931, an increase, you will observe, of over 30,000 miles.

In 1930 there were 14,939,000 miles flown and last year 21,381,000 miles flown.

There has been a lot said here about the rates paid to these air mail contractors. In 1930 the average rate was 0.978 cents. In 1931 the rate had been reduced to 0.792. On January 1 of this year there was a further reduction of the rate to 0.66, as against 0.97 last year.

Here is another important thing about the air mail service. In 1926 there were only 5,782 passengers carried. In 1931, five years later, there were 469,981 air mail passengers.

I bring that out to impress upon the committee how this service has been sold to the American public as the result of the Watres bill passed by Congress three years ago—a comparison of 5,000 passengers in 1926 to over 469,000 in 1931.

Now, this map here has been brought in so that you may see the picture of our air mail service as it exists to-day. There is great room for air mail expansion in various sections of this country. I pay tribute to the Postmaster General for the interest that he has shown in his department for air mail expansion. He has done a good job.

You will find on this map existing air lines, but you can observe also that many extensions are still needed. The Postmaster General said in the hearings that within three or four years he hoped to see the air mail on a self-sustaining basis.

There is another significant thing about this air mail proposition. Air mail activity in America for the past 12 months has been about the only activity where there has been an increase. Take business concerns in all sections of the country, and you can not find an exception of that kind. Air mail and commercial aviation have increased.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes.

Mr. ALLGOOD. If we subsidize any business at the rate of $10,000,000 a year, does not the gentleman think it would cause an increase? That is what I understand happened in the case of air mail.

Mr. McMILLAN. Oh, they have had a subsidy of $20,000,000, if you call it a subsidy, but the gentleman overlooks the value of this service. That is the recommendation of the department this year, but the Budget has cut it to $19,000,000.

Mr. BLAND. And is not the development of commercial aviation an important factor in national defense?

Mr. McMILLAN. It is one of the most important factors that I know for national defense.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I live at Peoria, Ill. We had an air mail there. It was taken away from us on account of our field. To-day every business man in Peoria is subscribing toward a fund of $400,000, out of his own pocket, to build a new field and bring back the air mail, now that they see the loss they have sustained by losing it.

Mr. McMILLAN. I am very glad the gentleman has interrupted me to say what he has, because throughout America you will find municipalities in all sections of the country in anticipation of getting this service, offered through this Watres bill, subscribing to funds to build airports, even in these depressed times, and they are floating bond issues for that purpose. Down in my city we floated a bond issue for this purpose, and to-day we have one of the finest fields that can be found anywhere. In Savannah, Jacksonville, Atlanta, and in all of the cities all over the country you will find that similar action for aid development has been taken in anticipation of getting air service and air mail.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. McMILLAN. I am sorry I can not—I have only a few minutes.

Mr. YON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McMILLAN. I have only a few minutes.

Mr. YON. I want to advise the committee also that along this line where the triangle is not completed——

Mr. McMILLAN. If I have the time, I shall call attention to the matter in which the gentleman is interested. I said in the beginning of my remarks that there are various places on this map showing where connections or extensions should be made. Here is one here from the Northwest over to the west coast, comprising an area that ought to be supplied. Here is one down here that the gentleman from Florida [Mr. YON] is interested in. Why not have a line from Jacksonville to New Orleans? This Congress appropriated $7,000,000 for the Pan American Airways that operates from Miami to South and Central America. This is a very important line because our trade under normal conditions with Central and South America amounts to $2,000,000,000 a year. Why not have a connecting line from Jacksonville over New Orleans connecting with the Pacific coast? That is where the gentleman from Florida [Mr. YON] is interested. Then look at this section through the Shenandoah Valley of Virginia, where there are millions of people and a great many cities of importance, with no air mail. We can not hope to get any extension or expansion of this service unless we get additional money. I hope you will support the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Chairman, a question has arisen as to whether $19,000,000 would be sufficient to meet air mail demands. Reference was made to Mr. Glover's testimony. I call attention to the testimony of Postmaster General Brown and read from the hearings on page 286:

We have been obliged very recently to make what amounted to a 10 per cent cut in compensation to contractors. A number of them feel very much aggrieved by it and feel that it is making them do business at a loss, and undoubtedly it is in these winter months when it is pretty hard to operate anyhow.

There are a number of services that ought to be increased to take care of the business that we are building up. We are spending now at the rate of $20,000,000 a year, and to get on a basis of $19,000,000 a year we will have to make another 5 per cent cut on the average, for this takes one-twentieth of our money.

He has cut, effective on the 1st day of January, 10 per cent from these contractors, and he says that if he has to make out with $19,000,000 it means he will have to reduce another 5 per cent. Let us see his testimony again. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WRIGHT], a member of the committee, asked him a question, which will be found on page 298.

With this $19,000,000 appropriation can you carry out the program you had contemplated?

Mr. Brown said:

No; I can not.

In reply to a question asked by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. ABERNETHY], page 298 of the hearings:

As a last proposition, for the record, I understand that you really need the $20,000,000 to carry on effectively according to the policy of the department?

To which the Postmaster General replied:

That is correct. I would say at least $20,000,000.

Again, when called on by Mr. ARNOLD to give an explanation as to what the Budget had in mind as to the matter, he said this, same page, 298:

I think Colonel Roop thought that if it did not turn out to be enough that we knew where to come for some more.

I called attention to this the other day. Under the provisions of the Watres Act, the Postmaster General could not create a deficit unless it was for an unforeseen emergency. This is not an unforeseen emergency. He knows exactly what the situation will be. He knows that $19,000,000 is not sufficient to carry on. He desires carrying on legally and efficiently, and therefore asks for $20,000,000.

There is another point I want to clear up. Somebody said you could operate a business with a subsidy of $10,000,000; but there is no subsidy of $10,000,000 in this. These are the facts: We appropriate $20,000,000 for the operation. The only subsidy there could be would be represented by the difference between the revenue derived from the operation of the business and the cost of the business under the appropriation. What is it? It is not $10,000,000. The revenue from the cancellation of air mail stamps and other stamps used for transmission of air mail is from $12,000,000 to $14,000,000 per year. The difference between that and the unexpended portion of the $19,000,000 or $20,000,000, or whatever it may be, would represent any subsidy that might be involved. In no event could it exceed five or six million. That is all there is to it. There is no $10,000,000 subsidy or anywhere near it. If you propose to cut out all of the postal subsidy you would better see as to the ninety to ninety-five million deficit or subsidy in the Postal Department.

Do you know what this air mail service is? Do you stop to think? Do you realize what you are doing when you reduce the appropriation? We have invested at various points in America $120,000,000 in airports. I think somebody asked the gentleman from Virginia something about where the airports were located. I can not tell just where they are located, but I know that individuals and corporations, private individuals and municipal organizations have invested at least $120,000,000 in the airports of this country. I got the figures from the Commerce Department yesterday. Now, whose money is this? It is your money, our neighbor's money—all private money invested in these airports, with the understanding and belief that we would make sufficient appropriation to keep up the air mail service. Now it is proposed to cut it down. It is proposed to hamper and hamstring the Postmaster General and the administration. It is proposed to cripple the airports in your own States, and to fail to furnish that service which we ought to have.

From Atlanta, Ga., to Charleston, S. C., is an air line. It is part of the system now, but there is no mail on it. The only thing they can do is to try to keep up that route. They can not likely keep it up without air mail contract and with passenger transportation alone. If you do not give them enough to operate what is now in existence, how do you expect any development?

Mr. LUDLOW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LARSEN. I yield.

Mr. LUDLOW. The gentleman has referred to the testimony of the Postmaster General. Permit me also to direct attention to the testimony of the Postmaster General on page 297:

Understand, we have just made a 10 per cent reduction effective the 1st of January. Now, to absorb this $1,000,000 that the Budget cut off we will have to make another 5 per cent cut if we are to live within our $19,000,000 in the next fiscal year. One cut has just been made and another is in sight.

Here the Postmaster General says that provision already is being made to bring the cost of the service within $19,000,000, so that there will be no curtailment of this service at all by passing this bill.

That was the testimony of Mr. Glover.

Mr. LARSEN. But I did not say anything about Mr. Glover. I am talking about the Postmaster General, the man who is in charge of this air mail service, and not some underling official. I did not undertake to read what Mr. Glover had said. I said the Postmaster General, who is the man responsible for the work, and who is the man that made the statement to which I referred.

Mr. LUDLOW. But I am reading the testimony of the Postmaster General, who said that these two cuts could be made.

Mr. LARSEN. No. He said he could not carry on the present development in answer to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. ABERNETHY].

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LARSEN. I yield.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. And on page 319 they say the amount expended is $16,942,000, leaving $3,000,000 of the $20,000,000 that has not been expended, in making this cut of 10 per cent and a threatened cut of 5 per cent more.

Mr. LARSEN. Yes; this still further reduces the amount of the alleged subsidy. Now, I want to call attention to some other things.

Mr. FISHBURNE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LARSEN. I yield.

Mr. FISHBURNE. The gentleman asked a few moments ago about a description of the airports on the proposed route from Washington to Chattanooga. I have here a list of the airports in all those cities if the gentleman desires to have them.

Mr. LARSEN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LANKFORD] said he would put that into the RECORD.

Now, I want to call attention to this fact. Down at Camp Benning in Georgia, near Columbus, Ga., is one of the greatest military training posts of the United States. There is no air line to Camp Benning or to Columbus. There is no service whatever. There should be; and we need a line across Columbus to Montgomery, Ala., to connect it up—the line from Chicago to New Orleans. There is one of the greatest military points in the South without any air facilities at all. How can we expect to develop anything unless we can get sufficient appropriations to do it?

Now, listen. In what were these pilots trained? Do you think they just run the ships? Not at all. Do you know what it involves? Here are some of the things. A pilot, if efficient, must learn the weather service. He must learn to translate and read the weather reports. He must know something as to radio. He has to learn the manipulation of radio instruments.

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LARSEN. He must learn something of radio. He must learn to manipulate the machine and the keyboard, just as one learns the keyboard in telegraphy, as it were. Then he must learn the practical navigation of the ship. He must learn all of these things. They do not get that in the Regular Army, and in case of a national emergency where are we going to get such men as that? In case of foreign invasion or foreign enemy were to undertake to invade our country, what would they do first? Naturally the first thing they would do would be to destroy our air bases. They would go to these Army bases, if possible, and blow them up, and that would end it all; but with several thousand of these privately owned airports, manned by efficient men, how easily we could take our ships into these various ports, and they never could do any damage to our aircraft. Yet these privately owned airports, built up and maintained by cities, municipalities, and individuals, at no cost whatever to the Government, are to be destroyed and neglected and allowed to grow up in weeds because of a supposed economy. We are too stingy to put on $1,000,000 in order to carry on work that is now in progress. It is an outrage, gentlemen, and you ought not to do it.

I want to call your attention to something else. You take our airships in the Army. They do not fly far enough to develop and find out the weak points in the engines. They never fly very much; in two years perhaps 1,000 hours; yet in commercial aviation the pilots get at least 100,000 hours in the air per year with one particular engine, so that they are able to develop the weak points in the engine and train flyers also. It is through this commercial aviation that we find weak points in our engines, and it is not through our Regular Army service.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LARSEN. Yes.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the gentleman in his remarks make a brief statement with respect to these contractors and the amount of money they have had to invest in order to put over a proposition of this character, and is it fair to them to make this cut when they have spent so much in trying to put the thing over?

Mr. LARSEN. As a matter of fact, if it is not fair to those who own the municipal airports; it could not be fair to those gentlemen who have taken the contracts and expected to receive sufficient appropriations to carry on the service. When they have gotten the service half-way built up it is now proposed to cut them down.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. We are carrying in this bill $19,000,000 for domestic air mail. That is the amount which was recommended by the Bureau of the Budget. The Post Office Department asked for $20,000,000. They presented that request to the Bureau of the Budget, but the Bureau of the Budget, after going over the matter very carefully, was of the opinion that this activity could be carried on without diminution on an appropriation of $19,000,000. This $19,000,000 is $1,000,000 less than was appropriated in 1932.

Of course, gentlemen, it goes without saying that we are all intensely interested in our domestic air mail, but permit me to call your attention to the rapid growth and development of this service as shown by appropriations. In 1927 the first appropriation that was made for domestic air mail was but $2,000,000, and since then it has reached the point where in 1932 we appropriated $20,000,000. It is a great service of which we are all proud.

Now, my sympathy is with you gentlemen who are interested in getting new and additional air lines, but permit me to call your attention to this fact: That with this $1,000,000 you seek to add by this amendment you have no assurance that you will get the lines you are particularly interested in. It will require far more than an additional million to put the contemplated new lines in service. Both the Postmaster General and the Second Assistant, who is in direct charge of this activity, tell us that they can maintain the present service at its present standard with the $19,000,000 appropriation and make such readjustments as may be necessary in existing lines.

Let me call your attention to this further fact, that in January of this year, through some readjustments which were made by the Postmaster General and the air mail contractors under the certificate plan, $1,240,000 was saved over the amounts that had previously been paid out on these contracts. We are told by the Postmaster General and by the Second Assistant Postmaster General that negotiations are under way for further reductions and that in the very near future it is entirely probable further reductions will be made. So if any of you gentlemen are of the opinion that this service can not be continued at its present standard with the $19,000,000 carried in the bill, disabuse your minds of that idea at once.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARNOLD. I yield.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I want to ask the gentleman how much service can be figured in a million dollars or in any other amount of money when you change the air mail service to provide delivery of hundreds of pounds of air mail for a big metropolis every day to half past 6 or 7 o'clock in the evening instead of 2 o'clock.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ARNOLD. Of course, that matter is an administrative one, and I can not answer the gentleman's question directly, but I know that this service has been developing year by year most satisfactorily from the standpoint of the air mail user. We have got to the place now where your committee felt that in view of the unfortunate economic situation throughout the country we could very well afford to mark time for one year and carry on this service for the fiscal year 1933 as it has been carried on during the fiscal year 1932; and these gentlemen who are so much concerned about getting additional air lines in their sections of the country can well bide their time for a year. This matter is only temporary, and when the Treasury gets in better shape further appropriations for expansion can be made.

Gentlemen, we are trying as far as we can to protect the Treasury of the United States without doing violence to the activities of the Federal Government. Here you have an opportunity to protect the Treasury to the extent of $1,000,000 without doing violence to this wonderful activity in the Post Office Department.

Mr. SWING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARNOLD. I yield.

Mr. SWING. I would like to call the gentleman's attention to a situation which does not involve the establishment of a new line but which is a line that has already been established, but for which there is no money to operate it even though the Government, at the expense of the Department of Commerce, has already put the lights along the route and laid out the landing fields ready to operate. This air line is from Phoenix to San Diego, a part of the Southern Airmail Line.

Mr. ARNOLD. I can not yield further.

Mr. SWING. And I am informed by Mr. Glover that they can not operate it on the appropriation now proposed.

Mr. ARNOLD. That matter is in the hands of the Postmaster General, and they tell us that with the savings already made and those they have in immediate prospect they can take care of readjustments on all lines where necessary.

Mr. SWING. He tells me he can not do that with the money now in the bill.

Mr. ARNOLD. They tell us they can, and if the gentleman will read the hearings carefully he will find they say they can do it.

Now, gentlemen, here is the situation: I am as much a friend of the air mail as any man in this House. In 1931 the cost of domestic air mail over and above receipts was something like $11,000,000. Of course, it would be a nice thing to have this service extended. Of course, every community would like to have air mail, but the situation is such that we have been making such rapid progress in development along this line that it will certainly not hurt us to mark time for one year, so long as we keep up the present standard.

Mr. MAAS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARNOLD. I yield.

Mr. MAAS. And it is only intended that this should be temporary anyway. It is not to set any precedent for the future?

Mr. ARNOLD. Absolutely not. It is not to set any precedent, and we are simply trying to protect the Treasury in such a way that this activity will not be interfered with, and yet we will save the $1,000,000 that is sought to be tied on to this bill.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARNOLD. I yield.

Mr. GOSS. Do I understand correctly that we are appropriating more money for air mail in foreign countries this year and yet we are not willing to increase this appropriation $1,000,000 for air mail in this country? Can the gentleman make that explanation to the House?

Mr. ARNOLD. The foreign air mail appropriation has not been increased. It probably would have been decreased had it not been for the fact that contracts were already in existence, and they are contracts under which the Government of the United States is obligated legally to pay. It was obligatory on us to appropriate the amounts necessary for the fulfillment of those contracts, otherwise the contractors would have gone into the Court of Claims, sued the Federal Government, and recovered judgment. The Government would have had no defense. Therefore we carry under the appropriation for foreign air mail service the same figure that was carried last year. This domestic air mail is costing us about $11,000,000 a year as a direct subsidy to air transport companies. We should not increase that subsidy under these unfortunate financial conditions. [Applause.]

Mr. LOOFBOUROW. Mr. Chairman, it has been said here repeatedly that under the present appropriation of $19,000,000 there will be no diminution of air mail service heretofore rendered, and that economies that were effected on January 1 of this year were made without hurting the service.

I want to call the attention of the committee to the line of the Western Air Express [indicating] that has operated between Los Angeles and Salt Lake City for seven years. It operated there 18 months as a passenger line before it had a mail contract. The owners put in $400,000 before they secured a mail contract. For more than four and a half years they have operated under a mail contract, carrying mail once each way in the daytime and once each way at night.

On January 1 of this year the night service was suspended, with the result that patrons of the mails now get as quick service with a 2-cent stamp as they formerly did with a 5-cent stamp, and mail brought down from the North on the National Parks Line and from the Northwest on the Pasco Line that gets into Salt Lake City in the evening is sent from Salt Lake City to San Francisco and south to Los Angeles instead of going down directly by the former night mail to Los Angeles. This is one of the economies that resulted in the saving of $1,200,000 referred to by the member of the committee.

Mr. MAAS. Is that a lighted airway?

Mr. LOOFBOUROW. A lighted airway; yes. It has been lighted for three years. The emergency fields are there; the lights are installed, but they are now dark.

Mr. STAFFORD. The service is still there, but it goes by a different route.

Mr. LOOFBOUROW. Yes; the mail goes to San Francisco and then south to Los Angeles, and it takes approximately 10 hours longer than heretofore.

Mr. STAFFORD. You do not get the same service by the other route?

Mr. LOOFBOUROW. No. It takes about 10 hours longer.

Mr. McMILLAN. That is a striking demonstration of whether there has been any diminution.

Mr. LOOFBOUROW. Up to January 1 they carried about 1,500 pounds by night mail, and now it is less than 75 pounds in the daytime. It has not only affected the weight of the mail between these points, but it reaches points further east hours later than formerly.

Mail originating in Los Angeles is now delayed 6 hours into Denver, 7 hours into Omaha, 11 hours into Chicago, 9 hours into St. Paul and Minneapolis, 10 hours into Detroit, 13 hours into Cleveland, 8 hours into Buffalo, and 8 hours into Albany, N. Y. Westbound mail from these points for Los Angeles is now delayed from two to four hours. The economy mentioned by the member of the committee has caused this deterioration in service.

Now, I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that between Washington and New York City there are five trips each way each day carrying air mail, and that between Washington and Richmond, Va., there are four trips each way each day. There has been no diminution on these trips. Certainly, a readjustment in the distribution of money available for this service is needed.

This line from Salt Lake City to Los Angeles is what the railroads call a transfer track. It carries the mail from one transcontinental line to another, now only in the daytime, but the mail which accumulates in the afternoon must wait until the next morning.

Mr. HASTINGS. The mail leaves there in the daytime, in the morning?

Mr. LOOFBOUROW. Yes; at 9.30 a. m. from each terminal city. At that time in the morning there is no mail from that day's work. The great volume of mail is deposited in the afternoon, and that must be carried the greater distance by way of San Francisco or wait overnight.

They have not only taken away the service between these cities; the mails are also delayed in the same way that are brought down to Salt Lake City from the national parks line to Salt Lake City and from Pasco.

All this deterioration in service has resulted from the economy of January 1, mentioned by the member of the committee.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the arguments advanced against the pending amendment by the distinguished members of the Appropriations Committee, indicating that we should mark time. The whole trouble with the present economic distress and unemployment is that too many business institutions in the Nation have been marking time, cutting their operations costs to the bone, with a result that millions of our best citizens have been forced to mark time while unemployed and unable to get a job.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to briefly present my views with reference to the item in the Treasury and Post Office Departments appropriation bill for the inland transportation of mail by aircraft.

The appropriation for this item during the current fiscal year was $20,000,000. While the Post Office Department's estimate to the Budget requested an appropriation for the next fiscal year of $21,000,000, the Budget estimate as transmitted to the House provided for only $19,000,000.

To these alleged economy experts in the House let me state that I have at no time heard complaint lodged against Postmaster General Brown because he was not practicing economy. In fact, all complaints with reference to economy in his department have been protests generally about the rigid economy which he had been practicing.

The original contract air mail law was passed seven years ago. During that brief period, under the able guidance of the Post Office Department pursuant to authority and appropriations voted to it by Congress, our domestic contract air mail system has come into existence and has developed until it is second to none in the world. I do feel that our commercial air transportation system is of such vital importance to our economic welfare, as well as to our national defense, that the appropriations for such service even in times like these should not be curtailed.

I, for one, take great pleasure in expressing the hope that the full amount requested by the Post Office Department for our domestic air mail service will be recommended by the Budget in the near future and appropriated by Congress.

There are several new air mail routes which would then be made possible. One of these is the route from Milwaukee, Wis., across Lake Michigan to Grand Rapids and Detroit.

In testifying before the Appropriations Committee, Assistant Postmaster General Glover referred to this route as one of those that would be provided with air mail service if $20,000,000 were available. On page 324 of the hearings he is quoted as stating, "that is a very fine service and a wonderful passenger service"; and again on page 330 he says "there is a tremendous demand for that service up there; there is a lot of time saved, and a great many passengers are using it."

This operation was inaugurated by the Kohler Aviation Co. in September of 1929. For two and one-half years they have been flying across Lake Michigan, winter and summer, with amphibian planes, without a single injury to passengers, personnel, or cargo. From the beginning their schedules have called for six crossings of Lake Michigan on week days and four on Sunday. The regularity and dependability of their service has been such that it is now commonly referred to as "the bridge that spans Lake Michigan." They have pioneered in the development of air express service, and last month carried over 19,000 pounds. They have carried about 12,000 passengers and have enabled the business men of Wisconsin and the Lower Peninsula of Michigan to save much valuable business time in traveling back and forth across the lake.

One can appreciate the importance of this service when you realize that the Michigan and Wisconsin shores are 6½ hours apart by boat, 8½ hours by train, and 45 minutes by plane.

This is the only operator who has conducted an all-year-round operation with amphibian planes over open water in northern latitudes. This operation is more than a year older than any other operation which has been conducted without an air mail contract.

I sincerely trust the funds will be made available to put air mail on this line, thereby not only according the operators a well-merited recognition but also providing the business men of the communities along their route with an air mail service which they urgently need and have frequently requested.

The present unnatural procedure of taking air mail around the lake by way of Chicago would be discontinued, and there would be created an important link in the direct mail service from the East through Milwaukee and into the Northwest.

The Milwaukee Association of Commerce, whose members include some of the largest taxpayers in the Nation, is heart and soul behind the proposed air mail service over Lake Michigan.

If we approach the consideration and advisability of voting for the pending amendment, carrying an additional million dollars for air mail service, from a national-defense standpoint alone, I believe we can justify our position in its favor. We know, particularly those of us who have seen planes in actual operation during a great conflict between nations, the importance that aviation will play in the future defense of our beloved country. The Committee on Naval Affairs of this Congress, after mature consideration, have favorably acted on a bill providing for almost a billion dollars to build ships for the purpose of national defense. Why, then, quibble over this million dollars of the taxpayers' money which will add so much to our national defense as well as improve the air mail service. Preceding speakers have called to your attention in detail how all of these airports and flyers made possible as a result of the Federal Government appropriation for air mail service will strengthen the arms of our Nation if we are forced into a future war. If my friend, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, desires to make up some of the million dollars carried in this amendment, he can do so in the regular Navy Department appropriation bill.

The Navy Department educates almost twice as many future officers in the United States Naval Academy as the Army educates in the United States Military Academy, although the Army officer personnel is larger than the Navy.

The Navy star-chamber performance of selection for promotion and placing on the retired list Naval Academy graduates who have not been selected should be discontinued, not only in the interest of fair play but in the interest of economy. The American taxpayers should not be compelled to pay for the training of so many midshipmen only to have them placed on the retired list in the prime of their lives at an annual cost of $2,500 for each one during their entire life because a few admirals in a star-chamber proceeding did not select them for promotion. At a future date I shall at length present facts and figures showing that economy can be had in this respect without injury to our national defense.

Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope that the pending amendment will pass, if only from a national-defense standpoint. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate upon this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 35 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, I rise in support of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LANKFORD].

I am in complete sympathy with the President, the Bureau of the Budget, and the Appropriations Committee in their laudable efforts to reduce the expenses of the Government to the end that the Budget may be balanced. Of course, this is of vital importance. I yield to none of my colleagues in my interest and advocacy of the strictest possible economy in the administration of our governmental machinery. In view of the critical condition of the Treasury, I believe every item of expense should be closely scrutinized and reduced to the minimum consistent with the proper and efficient administration of governmental functions. I am of the opinion, however, that even economy can be carried to extremes. A close-fisted, cheese-paring, parsimonious policy in providing funds for our governmental activities that results in the crippling of the service is, in my opinion, very poor economy. Efficient service should be taken into account in our labors and desires to bring Uncle Sam's expenses within the limits of his income.

Mr. Chairman, I think it will be conceded that there is no more popular or progressive branch of the Postal Service than the air mail. Every day it is growing in public favor and, in my opinion, it is destined to soon become the most important as well as the most beneficial service of the great Post Office Department.

I confess that, in addition to the general interest that I have in the air mail service, I have what might be considered a personal and selfish interest in this amendment. There is a section of country stretching approximately 750 miles west of Washington City that does not enjoy the direct benefits of air mail. It is the largest area east of the Mississippi River that does not participate in this great blessing.

My congressional district is a small part of that vast area. Some of the most patriotic and public-spirited people of the United States reside in that territory. Besides this score or more of progressive cities that will receive direct benefit from an air mail line that would bisect that area running from Washington City to Nashville, Tenn., hundreds of towns, hamlets, and communities, and at least 5,000,000 people would be benefited. Undoubtedly there are a number of other projects of perhaps equal merit in other sections of the country.

Air mail, while comparatively in its infancy, has already grown into a very large activity or industry, if you please. Showing the growth of the domestic air service during the last fiscal year, Mr. Glover, Second Assistant Postmaster General, has furnished me the following data:

	Fiscal year
Length of routes.....miles..	21,353	26,553
Average daily scheduled.....do....	62,349	95,121
Miles flown	14,939,466	21,381,852
Pounds carried	7,719,698	8,579,422
Average rate paid per mile.....cents..	97.8	79.2

The average rate paid per mile in the month of December, 1931, was 66 cents.

The increase in passengers carried since 1926 is particularly interesting. In 1926 there were 5,782 passengers carried, as against 469,981 in 1931.

Mr. Chairman, let us not be too niggard in our treatment of this very important infant industry. Let us not starve it to death or stunt its growth by withholding the necessary appropriation for its proper and deserved nourishment. I am in favor of economy, but I am opposed to an economy that will cripple or retard a great public service such as the air mail.

The department estimate for this service is $21,000,000. Let us "split the difference," to use horse-jockey parlance, and increase the appropriation to $20,000,000, in order that the department may make some highly desirable improvements and extensions, and in order that this very popular and important public service may not actually suffer. [Applause.]

Mr. LOVETTE. Mr. Chairman, I rise for only one purpose in connection with this discussion. I also live in this "lost continent" you see on this map. When I first came to Congress and became interested in the air mail I inquired about the service and procured a map. It is a map just like this air mail map you have before you now. I wondered why this great territory west of Washington, referred to by Mr. TAYLOR, was left out. I still wonder why. I am not criticizing anyone. I think the air mail system of the United States has developed wonderfully fast. I think the Postmaster General has been very diligent and efficient in the establishment of this great system, but I can not understand why it is that when you mail a letter at Washington for San Diego, Calif., or anywhere in the great Southwest, you have to carry it 250 miles farther than it ought to be carried; or when a passenger takes a plane in the city of Washington to go anywhere in the great Southwest you either carry him up to the Great Lakes, down to Columbus, Ohio, Cincinnati, Louisville, and into Nashville and on into the West, if he should be going that way, or bring him around by the Atlantic seaboard almost to the Gulf Coast, at Atlanta, and then start him to the West. It is approximately 850 miles from Washington around to Nashville either way you go. It is less than 650 miles right down the Shenandoah Valley to Nashville. Let me tell you what is in the Shenandoah Valley, if you do not already know it. There is Charlottesville with an airport; Roanoke with an airport; Bristol, Tenn.-Va., with one of the best airports in the country; Johnson City, Kingsport, Greeneville, and Knoxville, Tenn., and then to Nashville or Chattanooga, as the case may be. This line will traverse the most beautiful valleys in all of the eastern section of our country, beginning with the Shenandoah Valley, then going on down into the East Tennessee Valley to the Great Smoky Mountains National Park, where the Government and the people are spending millions of money, and which is one of the beauty spots of the United States. The cities along this route, such as Charlottesville, Roanoke, Bristol, Johnson City, Kingsport, Greeneville, and Knoxville, and many other smaller cities, are thriving, growing cities. There are from 3,000,000 to 5,000,000 good American citizens who live in this section of the country who have been deprived of the air mail since its institution. I can see no good reason why they should not have it. I have taken it up with the Post Office Department. I went to the Post Office Department, and they advised me that they did not have the money and that unless the appropriation fixed by the committee was raised they could not put it in.

I called their attention to the fact that we had been overlooked; that in the development of this great air mail system we had been left out. I called their attention to the fact that it was not good business or good economy to send mail from Washington first to the Great Lakes on the north, then back to Nashville, mail that was destined to go to the Southwest. I called their attention to the fact that it was not good business or good economy to send mail from Washington, via Richmond, down through the Carolinas, skirting the Atlantic seaboard, and almost to the Gulf coast at Atlanta, an additional distance of from 200 to 250 miles in reaching the Southwest, when a direct line from Washington, by Charlottesville, Roanoke, Bristol, Johnson City, Greeneville, Kingsport, Knoxville, and Nashville, would save fully three hours in time, aside from the additional expense of flying this extra distance, and the same is true as to passengers who go from Washington to the Southwest.

I called their attention to the fact that we had been overlooked in the establishment of air mail lines. If you will observe on the map before you, the space indicates where there are no air lines, and it is by far much larger than any space in the United States east of the Mississippi River not covered by air mail. In other words, each State or each section apparently is fully covered by air mail lines, and in some instances parallel lines, and our territory has been left out. Some one has fallen asleep at the switch.

I am not criticizing anyone, not even my distinguished predecessor who was here while these lines were being set up. I could not attribute it to his neglect. A Representative in Congress, Mr. RANSLEY, from the great State of Pennsylvania last year pronounced a eulogy on him and mailed 20,000 copies into my district under his frank as a campaign document, in which he said he was comparable to Abraham Lincoln, who is my political patron saint.

There must be something wrong, or some misunderstanding somewhere, for if there had been one as great as Abraham Lincoln, or even nearly as great as that great statesman, representing my district, I am sure that the Post Office Department, or even the Congress, in laying out the air mail system of this country could not have built rings around him, as is shown by the air mail lines on this map.

This neglect of my section of the country is wrong and ought to be cured in some way. In view of the advice from the Post Office Department that this line can not be built without an additional appropriation, I feel that the great need for it, together with the benefit that it will be to the system, demands that the appropriation be increased for this purpose. They have practically assured us that if the appropriation is increased they will be able to make this great improvement in the service. It is not only for the benefit of the people of our section of the country, but will be a great benefit to the people of the Nation, especially in establishing a shorter and more direct line from the Capital to the great Southwest. For that reason I hope that the amendment will pass.

I do not yield to any man in the House in my interest in the Budget, or in balancing the Budget; I believe in balancing the Budget; I believe in economy; I believe we ought to hold the expenses down. I try to do that with every vote I cast.

The proposed line that I am describing is good business and good economy, and will not only benefit a large section of the country that is entitled to it, but will enhance the efficiency of the system, as it is now already constituted, by making a shorter route from the Capital of the Nation to the great Southwest.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Chairman, my desire is to call attention to the entire lack of transcontinental air service in a part of the country that has not as yet been referred to in any detail.

It will be seen by this map that at the present time an air mail route reaches only into North Dakota from Chicago and the Twin Cities, but that there is a great stretch to the west that comprises approximately a thousand miles, reaching out to some of the greatest western cities, without any direct east and west air mail service.

The necessity for the increase of appropriation provided for in this pending amendment is due partly to the total lack of that service, and to the fact that without such an increase that service can not be provided.

Mr. LANHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVITT. I yield.

Mr. LANHAM. If this amendment is adopted and $20,000,000 is made available, will that insure the inauguration of that particular route?

Mr. LEAVITT. The situation is that without it we certainly can not get the route, and with it we have great hope that we can.

Mr. Chairman, I feel that the general case for the air mail service has been so well made that there is no necessity that I take the further time of the House in that direction. I only wish to call attention on the map to this great missing gap in the east and west air mail system as it now exists and to the fact that without an increase in funds that lack can not be supplied.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVITT. I yield.

Mr. McMILLAN. Last year's increase in poundage for air mail shows approximately a million pounds over the year 1930.

Mr. LEAVITT. That is undoubtedly true.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVITT. I yield.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I wish to call attention to the fact that they are cooperating in Canada in a transcontinental line, while they neglect the northwestern part of the United States.

Mr. LEAVITT. Indeed. The east and west line I refer to would go through Montana, would complete the line through North Dakota, the entire distance across Montana, northern Idaho, and the northern part of the State of Washington to Seattle. In addition there is need for an extension of what is now known as the national parks line, northward from Great Falls to Havre and into Canada, and for a line to Denver by way of Billings. I am active for those developments, but I am referring now particularly to the great missing part of the national system of east and west air mail lines known as the northern route, because that lack is plainly before you on this map.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time in order to give opportunity to another who desires to speak on this matter and who would otherwise be excluded by expiration of the agreed period of debate.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, as has been pointed out, it will be noticed on the map that the country is pretty well serviced by air mail, with one exception. One gap is left which, from a commercial and military standpoint, is one of the most important in the country. Each of the great transcontinental railroads is paralleled with an air line, with the exception of the northern part of the country, where there are four transcontinental railroads and not one air line. The policy of following trade territories requires that this gap be completed with air service, especially as we have these great distances out there which need air services even more than many of the congested sections of the country where distances are short.

I feel the next logical development is to extend the air service into Montana, which will eventually be extended to the coast.

Now, just a word from a military standpoint. One of the great benefits from and purposes of an air mail subsidy is to build up national defense. From a defense standpoint one of the most vulnerable parts of the country would be our northwestern section. When the Army undertook to move the fighting squadrons of its planes, a year or so ago in the winter, from their base at Selfridge Field, Mich., across the continent, they had a great deal of difficulty in this part of the country because of lack of ground facilities. The movement was a fizzle. It was no reflection on the Army Air Corps nor the pilots. They could not move those planes with any sort of expedition, because there were no ground facilities. There was no trouble about actual flying. It is of vital importance that we have all ground facilities for easy and quick movement of our planes from east to west, over this route, if they are needed.

Now, I understand the necessity for economy and I think all of us do, but we have just passed a bill calling for some $132,000,000 to build new roads. I believe we can well afford to appropriate one more million dollars, which is what the department itself requests, to complete the air picture of our traffic systems, and close the remaining gaps. Certainly it is unwise and unfair to leave one important section of the country, a great inland empire, if you please, without the same advantages and protection afforded to all the other parts of the Nation.

Some of the so-called feeder lines could certainly be deferred a while until the great natural trade channels are taken care of. The normal, long-established trade routes of the Northwest flow east and west. The whole trade territory of the Northwest has been built along these lines, until it is now so well accepted that any departure from this policy can only be artificial and tend to disturb and disrupt the whole area.

I wish to call the attention of the committee to the urgent necessity of extending the air mail facilities from the Twin Cities out into Montana at once, because of the very tendency to a departure from the normal trade routes inaugurated by the Post Office Department in recently granting an extension that will have the effect of interfering with the natural flow of trade and commerce of our trade territory and divert it to another channel.

A few weeks ago an extension to a mid-continent transcontinental air line was put into operation from Omaha, Nebr., to Watertown, S. Dak. This artificially cuts across a trade channel, and would tend to tap and divert established trade out of its normal east-west flow to a north-south traffic, inasmuch as it provides the only air service in that section. That is a trade abortion and an unwarranted trade invasion, because it does not follow natural development; it only upsets existing trade relations and tends to break down the whole plan.

Such an extension would be logical and should come, but only after the northern east-west air traffic is adequately established.

It is hardly a good plan to build the feeder lines before the main line itself is established.

But because this has already been done, as I have indicated, it is doubly important in order to prevent permanent injuring to the future development of this area, that an east-west extension be granted from the twin cities of St. Paul and Minneapolis out through one of the Dakotas into Montana, probably Helena, and this done at once.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back any remaining time I may have.

Mr. FISHBURNE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I simply rise to accentuate what the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. LOVETTE] has said about the importance of a line from Washington to Chattanooga or Nashville, right through the middle of this vast territory of 168,000 square miles shown on the map we have before us.

I represent a district which includes the great Shenandoah Valley and there are more than 2,000,000 people who would be accommodated by this line. It would run from Washington by Charlottesville, Lynchburg, Roanoke, Bristol, Johnson City, and Nashville, and at all of those places are now established airports, and short feeder lines could connect with Winchester and Harrisonburg. The territory it goes through is peculiar in this, that it is filled with universities, colleges, and schools. There are 15,000 students who would be accommodated by that air line, and it has been found that schools and universities use the air mail to a great extent. The business men throughout this territory are clamoring for this service.

I have in my hand a very elaborate abstract and survey of this proposed route, and I would be very glad if every Member of the House could see it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe there is anyone in this House who has any more personal interest in the development of aviation than I have. I have been with it since its very birth in this country.

Gentlemen, I want to say in all frankness that the $1,000,000 that you suggest here would not commence to give you all the lines you want. You would be fighting among yourselves after the $1,000,000 was granted.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. At least give us a chance to fight over it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. All right. Had it not been for the unfortunate development out West on the Century Lines I believe the appropriations would have been reduced even more than they were.

My interest in supporting the committee to-day is that I do not want to be a party to the killing of the goose that laid the golden egg. No one can properly say the United States Government is starving aviation. With the $19,000,000 appropriated in this bill and the establishment and maintenance of lighted airways, weather service, scientific and technical aid, as well as the appropriations made for the Army and the Navy for equipment, which gives the industry an opportunity to live at this time, we have been most generous. Within 10 years from now I will say that 90 per cent of the mail will be carried by air. It can not be stopped. But we can not, as I see the present conditions and the differences of opinion existing, do any more this year. What I would suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee, the distinguished chairman of the committee, as well as to the legislative committee, is that provision should be made whereby air mail may be transported on a poundage basis between any two given points without a subsidized postal contract. When I say without a subsidy I mean a postal contract under the special law establishing the subsidy system.

I believe we have arrived at the time when it is up to aviation to show what it can do, and it can do that by carrying the mail between points on a poundage basis. Of course, I assume absolute fairness to all reputable companies on the part of the Post Office Department. On the other hand, the pioneer companies can not and must not be destroyed.

Now, gentlemen, when I say that within 10 years we will carry all the mail by air I am absolutely convinced of that. You will find that we appropriate for railroad transportation $115,000,000. That is a decrease of $12,000,000, but that decrease is due to the falling off of business. Now, the increase for aviation must be reflected in a decrease in the cost of railway transportation. That is how aviation can get more appropriations for transportation of mail.

Mr. ARNOLD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. ARNOLD. It appears in the hearings that the decrease in the amount provided for the carrying of mail by the railroads was due to the fact that so many of the short-line railroads are being taken off and they have to supplement that service by trucks and busses.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I understand. The point I am trying to develop is this: As aviation grows, without artificial stimulation, it must come from that amount. The more mail transported by air the less by rail. The less by rail the more money for aviation. I have confidence in the success of aviation as a means of transportation for mail.

At this very moment there is a bill before the Post Office Committee on which hearings are being held, and there exists a difference of opinion as to what is the proper rate to be paid to these companies. Let us go along this year with this appropriation. Next year, I hope, all existing doubt and differences will be removed. Let present operating companies take heed; we expect our pilots to be kept on a high professional level and properly paid.

It is encouraging to note the great interest in aviation as expressed on this floor to-day. Indeed, a big change of attitude of former years. This new industry is certain of its future.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I want to draw your attention to the western part of the United States also. I have listened to this debate attentively, and it is difficult to determine whether to support the amendment or not. But in the light of what has been said, I am inclined to support the amendment, because when the Post Office Department changed the air mail service from Los Angeles to Denver by way of Salt Lake City it resulted in the delivery of air mail at Denver at about 6.30 in the evening—too late for any business on the date of delivery. Officials of the post office said that by so doing they were going to save money. But if there is to be any saving of money made by delivering business mail at 6.30 in the evening, I do not know how it can be done. I am told that the quantity of air mail has decreased from 1,500 pounds per day to 50 or 60 pounds per day on this delivery. Of course it would be so.

Now, another subject: Gentlemen from the Northwestern States have been telling you about this area in here [indicating on map]. Here is the area across from Mexico to Canada. We have been trying to obtain air mail service through this area by way of Denver, Cheyenne, Casper, Sheridan, and Billings. Air mail service has not yet been established, and the Government regrets that it has not enough funds available for this new service. Of course, you can tell by this map that this additional routing is coming and that it is necessary. Whether it is intended to be included in this year's program I do not know. Maybe it can be postponed. Perhaps it ought to be postponed; but you can see by looking at this map that the open spaces between the ends of these routes are going to be brought together and closed up some day—north and south and east and west, making through air mail transportation.

I know something of the business and mail possibilities of air service between Denver and Billings, and I do not hesitate to represent that the net amount of money which may be called subsidy which might be paid in connection with the establishment of such a line would be far less than amounts which I have been told have been paid upon even less mileage in connection with some lines.

I submit to you who are talking about the amount of money involved that you know full well how much money the Post Office Department has had to establish air mail service. You know what the department asked for in this bill and what was approved in the Budget. If the change in the Los Angeles-Denver air mail and the refusal to establish a Denver-Billings line was a part of a plan to induce some of us to come on the floor of this House and badger the committee to give the Post Office a million dollars more for air mail, and if they need it, I want to help them get it. But if the plan is simply to have some of us make a play here to ask for some more money, then I am not interested in such a play.

Mr. ARNOLD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. ARNOLD. We do not know what this million dollars in figures may be used for—increasing night lines or for increased frequency on existing lines.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARNOLD] will realize that when you change the schedule for delivery of air mail so that what formerly amounted to 1,500 pounds of air mail began to arrive at Denver, Colo., from the West at 6.30 o'clock in the evening, it did not take long for the business people who were sending mail that way to learn about the change in delivery and to begin sending their mail under 2-cent postage. For the 2-cent letters would be delivered the next morning, and so would the air mail.

In other words, delivery at 6.30 in the evening practically cuts off 24 hours of the air mail service. So air mail that theretofore was delivered after a 2 o'clock airplane arrival reached the banks and business houses in time to be a part of that day's business. The Post Office Department has stated that the quantity of mail now carried is insufficient to reestablish the old service, which included some night flying. Of course it is, and the revenue is the difference between that collected from stamps on hundreds of pounds and the amount collected on tens of pounds.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. McMILLAN. And that reduction has a corresponding effect on the reduction of revenue?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Absolutely. It cuts the revenue right straight out.

Mr. McMILLAN. And that applies to all sections where that situation exists?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Yes; 50 or 60 pounds of mail is simply curiosity mail by people who merely want to put a 5-cent stamp on a letter so as to have it marked and transported as air mail. That is not the business that will build up air mail delivery.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I want to point out the very evident lack of a completed air mail system through the northwest part of the United States.

The map itself indicates that this section of the country is simply waiting for a line, as indicated by my pointer here. [Indicating.] This stub, this stub, and this stub would be connected, and at the same time you get your north-and-south connections at three different places here.

This is one of the great perishable commodity producing sections of the entire United States. They have occasion to pass their mail back and forth in the shortest time possible, and they have often been handicapped by the time required.

Here is a great section not served at all. The mail that comes down from Alaska would be picked up there [indicating] and brought at once directly across to the central part of the United States.

So we hope we may succeed in getting the connection across here that we have been trying to get for the past several years. It would serve the Dakotas, Minnesota, Montana, a part of Wyoming, Idaho, Washington, and many of the various connections to which I have referred, and would also serve Alaska and the mail that comes from across the Pacific.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this amendment. I think the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] has the correct idea. The gentleman has been a friend of the air service, and it has been brought out in this discussion that the air service now, from the standpoint of carrying passengers, is largely able to care for itself, and that the Government ought not to be called upon to subsidize further this part of our mail service.

It has been brought out that 1,000,000 additional pounds of mail was carried in this way last year, but it has also been brought out that it cost the taxpayers of this country approximately $18,000,000 to secure and carry this additional 1,000,000 pounds of mail. So there is $18 a pound for each additional pound of mail that you are carrying.

We are coming to a time in this country when we have got to slow down. You talk about national defense here. I think the greatest question of national defense is defending the Treasury of the United States, and I think the people back home realize that this is the greatest question before the Congress to-day. If you want national defense, defend the Treasury, because if you bankrupt the Treasury of the United States and utterly destroy our credit, how are you going to defend this country in case of war or in case of invasion?

So here is one place where you can cut out money, and instead of adding $1,000,000 you can cut out $10,000,000 by adopting my amendment, because the hearings show that the air mail can be carried for one-half the amount it is being carried for now. This is the evidence in the hearings.

Mr. Chairman, I have just received the information from the Committee on Public Buildings that no more contracts for the erection of post-office buildings anywhere in the United States would be let for this year. I want to say that I heartily indorse the economy program which the House has instituted, and it is my wish that we might economize in every one of these appropriation bills; but why economize so rigidly in one of the needed branches of the mail service by refusing to continue the erection of post-office buildings where they are actually needed and denying an opportunity for the employment of much of the unemployed labor, and then allow this increase in expenditures of tax money to further subsidize an already oversubsidized air transport company engaged in the carrying of air mail? To my mind this is a wanton waste of the tax money of our people and should be stopped. I am, therefore, opposed to this amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. ALLGOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment as a substitute for the pending amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 57, line 25, strike out the figures "$19,000,000" and insert the figures "$10,000,000."

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I think the very best answer that could be made to those who have advocated the increase of this appropriation is the map now before you. I think if you will look at that map, gentlemen, and see the wonderful progress in putting in air mail lines that has been made during the past four years, you will agree with me that the Government has been going at a pretty rapid pace in the establishment of air routes.

I am a friend of the air mail service. For several years the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THATCHER] and I, on the committee, have been standing for every reasonable appropriation if it would help the air service.

But after all, gentlemen, the $19,000,000 is in accordance with the request of the Budget for the continuance of the service for the next year, and $11,000,000 of that, in round figures, represents nothing more or less than a plain subsidy in the interest of the service.

There is such a thing as loading down the service, and I want to say to those who favor the air mail service that if you increase too fast, if you proceed too rapidly, if you make it too great a burden on the people of the country, you will find that you have done the air mail service an injury rather than a benefit.

There is not one of you gentlemen who have spoken in favor of a million-dollar increase who knows that you will get a route if the amendment is adopted. There are a number of applications throughout the country, and I suspect that most of those who made speeches in the interest of the million-dollar increase, if granted, will be sadly disappointed when the time comes to allocate the million dollars extra.

We have granted the Budget estimate. We have not diminished it a dollar. That is all the Budget asked for, and Mr. Glover, as the gentleman from Indiana said a while ago, said that the $19,000,000 would be sufficient to carry on the present service during the year.

Mr. LOOFBOUROW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. LOOFBOUROW. Then how does the gentleman explain the situation between Salt Lake and Los Angeles, where the night flying has been taken off as a matter of economy?

Mr. BYRNS. I do not know. The gentleman can get that information from the Post Office Department. I will say that the hearings disclose that $19,000,000 will be sufficient to carry on the present service. It was suggested that it might prevent greater frequency on some of the routes, or some night flying, which might possibly be put on during the year.

But, gentlemen, can not that wait one year; can not we postpone for one year the further establishment of these routes? Can not we, in the interest of the taxpayers of this country during this great depression, postpone for one year the further proposed lines? The present lines are now taking $19,000,000 to carry on. We are not going to deprive anybody now getting the service.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I call the attention of the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee to the fact that Richmond County and Augusta, Ga., with a population of 75,000 people, are now a portion of my district, and that they are deeply interested in the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. BYRNS. Yes; and the State of Georgia. If we should appropriate the extra million dollars, it will not be sufficient to satisfy the gentleman from Washington, the gentleman from Tennessee, the gentleman from South Carolina, the gentleman from Virginia, and the gentleman from Georgia, who are advocating this extension. Somebody is going to be disappointed. Let us not disappoint anyone, but simply go ahead and provide this service as the Budget has asked us to do, and hold down these appropriations within the limits of the Budget.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired. All time has expired.

The question first comes on the substitute amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken, and the substitute amendment was rejected.

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Chairman, let us have the Lankford amendment again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the Lankford amendment.

There was no objection; and the Clerk again reported the Lankford amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the Lankford amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 75, noes 70.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia and Mr. BYRNS to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 74, noes 94.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For miscellaneous equipment and supplies, including the purchase and repair of furniture, package boxes, posts, trucks, baskets, satchels, straps, letter-box paint, baling machines, perforating machines, duplicating machines, printing presses, directories, cleaning supplies, and the manufacture, repair, and exchange of equipment, the erection and painting of letter-box equipment, and for the purchase and repair of presses and dies for use in the manufacture of letter boxes; for postmarking, rating, money-order stamps, and electrotype plates and repairs to same; metal, rubber, and combination type, dates and figures, type holders, ink pads for canceling and stamping purposes, and for the purchase, exchange, and repair of typewriting machines, envelope-opening machines, and computing machines, copying presses, numbering machines, time recorders, letter balances, scales (exclusive of dormant or built-in platform scales in Federal buildings), test weights, and miscellaneous articles purchased and furnished directly to the Postal Service, including complete equipment and furniture for post offices in leased quarters; for miscellaneous expenses in the preparation and publication of post-route maps and rural-delivery maps or blue prints, including tracing for photolithographic reproduction; for other expenditures necessary and incidental to post offices of the first, second, and third classes, and offices of the fourth class having or to have rural-delivery service, and for letter boxes, $1,700,000; and the Postmaster General may authorize the sale to the public of post-route maps and rural-delivery maps or blue prints at the cost of printing and 10 per cent thereof added; of this amount $1,500 may be expended in the purchase of atlases and geographical and technical works: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the purchase of furniture and complete equipment for third-class post offices except miscellaneous equipment of the general character furnished such offices during the fiscal year 1931.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order upon the paragraph to inquire of the chairman of the committee as to the need for the last proviso whereby you restrict the use of furniture to third-class post offices in some respects.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, the appropriation for last year was $300,000 for the purchase of furniture in third-class offices. It was stated in the hearings that with that $300,000 they had supplied 200 offices. The plan was to continue to supply third-class offices upon the theory that it would cost less money in the long run, and that they would complete the job in the next 20 years. There are some 9,000 third-class offices. Gentlemen can see just how long it would take to supply them at the rate of 200 a year, and it would cost eventually $15,000,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Was it the purpose of the department to supplant the old equipment and furniture in third-class offices and replace them with Government-owned equipment?

Mr. BYRNS. Eventually, yes. The postmasters, as the gentleman knows, supply the furniture now, but it was the purpose of the Government to supply it in the manner and at the rate that I have indicated.

Mr. STAFFORD. And it is the thought of the committee to abandon the policy that was initiated last year?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes; and the proviso was put in for that purpose.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is not intended to destroy the right of third-class postmasters to furnish their own equipment if they see fit.

Mr. BYRNS. Not at all.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. In the last Congress the Post Office Committee had a proposal to allow these third-class postmasters to have 50 per cent of the actual amount collected for box rent through their own equipment. The department assured us that we should not pass such a bill, because they would have $300,000 on the yearly appropriation bills to put Government-owned equipment in these third-class offices. Now, this appropriation is not carried.

Mr. BYRNS. Of course, the Committee on Appropriations and the Congress were not a party to any agreement that might have been made by the Post Office Department, but here we had a situation of $300,000 being appropriated. It had supplied only 200 third-class offices. That leaves 8,800 not yet supplied. It was in effect an increase of salary for 200, but what about the 8,800 third-class postmasters that would not get it, and some who would not get it for 20 years, and before the end of the 20 years Congress would find itself appropriating money to supply new furniture for the offices being supplied now. I think it was wholly impracticable, if such an agreement was made.

Mr. STAFFORD. What was the motive that prompted the committee to launch into this policy when a bare statement of it shows it to be of an extravagant character?

Mr. BYRNS. I am speaking for the committee as constituted at the present time.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the gentleman was on the Committee on Appropriations last year. Was it with the idea of giving more employment at the expense of the Government for the benefit of the third-class postmasters?

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] has given the only reason that could have prompted it.

Mr. STAFFORD. What could have been the reason except that of taking Government money and putting it in the hands of third-class postmasters for the purchase of furniture? I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. FOSS. Does this prevent the department from supplying furniture in new buildings for third-class offices?

Mr. BYRNS. This has no relation to the new buildings.

Mr. FOSS. Under the third-class offices—I mean, of course, leased buildings.

Mr. BYRNS. This is in rented buildings. Under the present arrangement the third-class postmasters are under the necessity of supplying most of the furniture.

Mr. FOSS. A great many of our third-class offices are housed in very poor quarters, and they have very poor fixtures, and when we move into a new building, under lease, it has been the policy of the department to furnish new furniture for those offices. Will this prevent the department from continuing to do this?

Mr. BYRNS. Not with reference to the third-class post offices. It has never been the policy, except for the last year, and they furnished 200 last year, but I submit if we have 9,000 offices and furnish 200 per year, it will be a long time before some of them will get their new furniture. If we are going to do it for any, we ought to do it for all, and it would require ten or fifteen million dollars to do it.

Mr. FOSS. Of course, the gentleman knows that the third-class postmaster, receiving a salary of $1,400, can not afford to pay a thousand or twelve hundred dollars for new fixtures.

Mr. BYRNS. That may be true.

Mr. FOSS. And then the Government takes the box rents.

Mr. BYRNS. But if he is not getting enough money, I would rather vote him a direct salary rather than to give him these perquisites in the way of furniture. In other words, it would be better to let the country know what he is getting in the way of salary rather than to be supplementing his salary by these perquisites.

Mr. FOSS. I agree with the gentleman absolutely. We should take over all of the third-class equipment.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, one of the few remaining subjects before this House in which the country is interested is the question of taxes. Emergency reconstruction legislation has been completed. Further tariff legislation has been definitely shelved. Most of the supply bills are now under way. A vote on prohibition is assured and will be taken within the next week or two. Only the question of taxation remains. But the question of taxes presents an unusually difficult problem this year. We are faced by the greatest peace-time deficit in the history of the Nation. The Treasury reports a deficit of approximately $2,000,000,000. One billion two hundred and forty million dollars additional revenue must be raised to balance the Budget.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. With pleasure.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I did not understand whether the gentleman said the tariff question had been settled.

Mr. CANNON. Has been definitely shelved for this session.

Mr. Chairman, we must raise an unprecedented sum in taxes for the coming fiscal year. And the question is who is going to pay it. Is it to be paid by the wealth of the country—by those who have it to pay? Or is it to be saddled on the masses of the people—those who even now are reducing their standard of living to the irreducible minimum? Is it to be paid from the impounded surplus of those who are hoarding vast resources? Or is it to be paid from the daily pittance of the toiler?

In other words, does the House propose to raise this vast sum from income taxes, surtaxes, estate taxes, excess-profit taxes, corporation taxes—taxes which have heretofore been utilized for that purpose—or do we propose to change our policy of taxation and raise it by a sales tax—a tax levied on the citizen regardless of his income or his ability to pay? That is the question in which the country is interested this morning.

Mr. GARBER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. GARBER. Why not raise some of it by a tax on the importation of crude oil and refined products?

Mr. CANNON. That is a very interesting query.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER. And why not raise about five hundred million by a tax on good, wholesome beer?

Mr. CANNON. And that likewise is a very interesting query.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. There is no such animal.

Mr. CANNON. The House has not suffered from lack of advice as to the method by which this money should be raised. Metropolitan newspapers, owned and controlled by intrenched wealth, have urged a sales tax ever since the close of the war. Secretaries of the Treasury possessed of vast fortunes have recommended a sales tax in season and out of season. Corporations which profiteered unmercifully and international bankers who helped bring on the present depression by forcing worthless foreign bonds on our investors are clamoring for a sales tax. The corridors of the Capitol are crowded with lobbyists representing big business importuning Members and committees in behalf of a sales tax.

Why all this clamor for a sales tax? The explanation is very simple. They want to lift the burden of government from the great incomes to the wage earner, the farmer, the small tradesman, the masses of the people. They want to shift the weight of taxation from the rich to the poor. And they know they can do it with a sales tax.

What is a sales tax? A sales tax is the most iniquitous, most reprehensible, most unconscionable device for plundering the people ever devised since the days of Captain Kidd. [Applause.] It is a nuisance tax in the worst form. It is a daily toll exacted from the wages of labor, the unrequited sweat of the farmer, and the meager fee of the tradesman. It taxes every purchase. It adds to the cost of every necessity from a tractor to a match. It increases the price of the swaddling clothes of the infant, the wedding gown of the bride, the weeds of the widow, and the simple habiliments of the aged. It taxes the primer in the school, the almanac in the farm kitchen, the magazine in the barber shop, and the Bible in the church. It takes shoes from children's feet; it drives the rain through the shattered roof of the tenement; it snatches healing medicaments from the fevered brow of pain; and it denies the bier of the veteran the tribute of the flag beneath which he served. From poverty and penury and toil it takes its inevitable and relentless toll in order that wealth and power and profiteers may go untaxed. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, the sales tax—sometimes designated as a manufacturer's tax—is in direct violation of the fundamental law of taxation as laid down by every economist since Adam Smith. Adam Smith, in his Wealth of Nations, wrote it in this form:

> The subjects of every State ought to contribute to the support of the Government in proportion to the revenue which they, respectively, enjoy under its protection.

And that law is cited and reaffirmed by every authority on taxation from John Stuart Mill to the present day. It is the basic principle of taxation—that every man should be taxed in proportion to his ability to pay and not in proportion to what he consumes. Under the sales tax the rich man pays no higher tax than the poor man.

When Mr. Mellon, with an income of thousands of dollars a day, buys a lead pencil or a bottle of quinine or a package of cigarettes he pays no more tax on them than the workingman, whose income is a wage of $1 a day. The housewife buying a paper of pins or a cake of soap or a can of baking powder pays the same tax on them for the support of the Government whether she lives in a hovel or a mansion. They are not paying in proportion to their ability to pay. They are not paying in proportion to the service rendered them by the Government.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Ability, coupled with the benefit derived from government.

Mr. CANNON. Ability, coupled with the benefit derived from government. Yes.

Let us illustrate the operation of the sales tax. One of your neighbors has a number of children. The wealthiest man in your neighborhood has none. When school opens your neighbor must pay taxes on school books for every child. The man of wealth pays none. Your neighbor must pay taxes on shoes and clothing for his children and himself. The rich man pays only on his own. No wonder the rich man wants a sales tax. No wonder Wall Street wants a sales tax. It transfers taxes to the consumer. It saves them from an income tax.

Let us see how a sales tax would work in the abstract. According to official statistics, 65 per cent of the people of the United States receive only 4½ per cent of the total income paid to the people of the United States and 35 per cent of the people of the United States receive 95½ per cent of the income of the people of the United States. Under an income tax the 35 per cent would pay taxes on 95½ per cent of the income and the 65 per cent would only pay on the 4½ per cent. But under a sales tax the 65 per cent of the people who receive 4½ per cent of the income pay 65 per cent of the cost of supporting the Government and the 35 per cent of the people who receive 95½ per cent of the income pay only 35 per cent of the expense of supporting the Government. Of course, the 35 per cent are very much in favor of a sales tax and very much opposed to an income tax.

Let us go further and estimate the amounts which would be paid by the rich and the poor, respectively, under a sales tax. Here it is: For every 1 per cent sales tax or manufacturers' tax levied by the Government, all the people of the United States with incomes of less than $1,800 a year would pay into the Treasury $100,000,000 a year. The people of the United States whose incomes amounted to more than $100,000 a year each, would pay into the Treasury only $10,000,000 a year. If the sales tax was 2 per cent, the poor would pay into the Treasury $200,000,000 and the rich would pay $20,000,000. If the tax was 2¼ per cent, as rumor to-day suggests will be offered in the House, the men receiving less than $1,800 a year would pay in $225,000,000 and men receiving from $100,000 to $5,000,000 annual income would pay in only $22,500,000. The smaller your income the larger the burden the sales tax places on you. The larger your income the smaller proportionately is the amount of your tax. The sales tax saddles the burden of government directly on the people least able to bear it. It places the weight of taxation on those who derive the least benefit and protection from the Government. It is a tax on the poor. It is a tax on the farm. It is a tax on labor. It is a tax on childhood. It is a tax on civilization. It will reduce the attendance of our schools. It will deny the educational advantages of the motion picture. It will curtail the revenues of the church itself.

But let us take up another objectionable feature of the sales tax—the collection of the tax. It is to be collected from the manufacturer. Of course, the manufacturer will not pay the tax himself. He will pass it on. And he will have three options—

First, he can pass it on to the consumer by simply adding the tax to the selling price.

Second, he can pass it on to the producer of his raw material. The packer can deduct the tax from the price he pays the farmer for livestock. The spinner can pass it on to the grower of cotton. The miller can take it out of the price of grain. The shoemaker can deduct it from the price he pays for hides.

Or, third, he can take it out of the price of labor. He can deduct it from the wages he pays his workmen. As a matter of fact, they will probably take it out of all three. They will increase the price of their product, decrease the price paid for raw material, and lower wages.

No one will suffer more from the adoption of the sales tax than labor. It will increase the cost of the necessities of life; it will curtail employment; and it will reduce the wage scale. But his employer is a warm advocate of the sales tax. It gives him a profit from three sources. It saves him from paying a surtax on his income. He escapes further corporation taxes. And he pays no higher tax on what he consumes himself than his poorest paid employee.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, a sales tax is particularly inopportune at this time. We are in the trough of the greatest business depression in the economic history of the world. We are just beginning to beat back against the tide. Any influence which serves to check recovery is a national menace, and that is precisely what the sales tax does. It slows up business. It retards industry. It defers the return of the country to normal conditions. It acts as a brake on returning prosperity.

A sales tax becomes immediately a cost of production. The tax has to be added to the cost. It increases the price of the commodity. And it is another immutable principle of economic law that when you increase price you decrease demand. It is axiomatic that the higher the price of a commodity the less people buy. And the less they buy the less the factory produces. And the less the factory produces the less the demand for raw material and labor.

When you place a tax on a commodity you not only slow down production at the factory but you take away the farmer's market and you deprive more men of a job and turn more unemployed out to walk the streets. The whole current of commerce is checked, the reconstruction measures passed by Congress are neutralized, and the country sinks hopelessly back into the jaws of the depression.

It was just such a system of taxation that fomented the French Revolution. The aristocracy was subject only to consumption duties. Wealth went untaxed. The nobles with vast landed estates paid no higher tax for the support of the Government on what they consumed than did the poorest subjects of the King. Louis dismissed every minister who sought to equalize the burden and tax the nobles in proportion to their ability to pay. And the revolution followed.

I have no doubt that many Members were reminded of that when they read in this morning's papers the account of the uprising of the people in the capital of the State of Kentucky against an administration which sought to impose upon the people of the Commonwealth a sales tax similar to that proposed for the consideration of this Congress. We will never have a revolution in America. We passed that stage of political development long ago. But the people of the various constituencies represented in this House will register their disapproval in a manner no less effective if it is ever attempted. Such a tax is indefensible, inequitable, uneconomic, undemocratic, unwise, unfair, and un-American. And there are Members on both sides of the aisle who will never support any measure which carries it. [Applause.]

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes out of order.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I do not know whether this is the beginning of a discussion on matters foreign to the bill or not, but we want to get through with the consideration of this bill. We have another appropriation bill that will be taken up just as soon as this one is disposed of, and these gentlemen can all get ample time in general debate. There are gentlemen here who are waiting the disposition of this bill. I am not going to object to the request of the gentleman from Kansas, but I shall object to other speeches being made unless they are pertinent to the pending bill. I feel we have got to get through with the consideration of this measure.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I rise in defense of the Democratic Ways and Means Committee that, I understand, is about to bring in a bill providing for a manufacturers' tax. I came to Congress about 13 years ago, at which time we were burdened with all kinds of general sales taxes, which were termed "nuisance taxes." I voted to repeal them, and commencing with the tax on soda water and going down the line all nuisance taxes were at last repealed.

We then commenced to raise the exemption on the people of the country until we only required heads of families with incomes above $3,500 per year to pay taxes on their incomes. We thus exempted 95 per cent of the people from the payment of income taxes. We now have found that incomes have fallen off so that we are not collecting enough money to run the Government. Where are we going to get this money?

I am in favor of a manufacturers' tax, and I want to tell you why. I went to Canada about eight years ago to study their tax system. They had just repealed their nuisance or general sales taxes and had placed on their statute books instead a manufacturers' tax. I first went to the tax commission to ask them how it worked, and they said, "Fine; we are collecting this tax throughout the Dominion of Canada with 30 men." I then went to the manufacturers and said, "How do you like it?" They said, "Fine; we pass it on," just as my friend from Missouri has said. I then went to the jobbers and I asked how they liked it, and they said, "We like it"; I asked why, and they replied, "Because we are not eternally troubled with a lot of government tax collectors coming in here and quarreling with us and going over our books." I said, "Do you pass it all on?" and they said, "We can not," and they took down their invoices and showed me where there was added, when they paid their wholesale bills, one cent and a half tax. When I asked, "How do you pay it?" and they said, "We charge it up just like we do our rent, our salaries, and insurance, as overhead expense." I asked, "Do you not add a little more profit to your goods?" and they replied, "Why, of course, if we can, but can not always do so. We can not add so small a tax on notions or on overalls or shoes and hundreds of such goods that sell for but a few dollars. Competition prevents our doing so. We have to absorb much of such a tax, but," they said, "we would prefer doing so to being annoyed and bothered with tax collectors, making reports, and so forth."

Then I went down and asked the man on the street, "How do you like this tax?" and he said, "What tax?" I said "The manufacturers' tax"; and he said, "Oh, we have no such tax; we repealed our sale taxes"; but I said, "You have a manufacturers' tax"; and he said, "Oh, no; we do not."

I went with a Member of this House into a store to buy a suit of clothes and we said to the salesman, "How do you like the manufacturers' tax?" and he said, "We have no such tax"; and we had to go to the manager of the store before we found anyone who knew that they had any such tax; and he said, "Yes; we do have a tax, but it is not the old general sales tax; it is a manufacturers' tax. We like it."

Now, my friends, the Democratic Ways and Means Committee, I understand, is proposing a 2-cent manufacturers' tax. How is this going to hurt the man in the street? The things that he buys will either have no tax placed on them; or, if they do, it will be so small that he will neither feel nor know it. It will be only those who buy in large quantities who will know anything about this tax.

If they put a 2-cent tax upon manufactured goods, it will raise a large amount of revenue and the men who spend the most money will pay the most tax.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. How would this manufacturers' sales tax affect your independent oil producers whom the gentleman has been talking about for some months? Does the gentleman think it will help them get out of their present deplorable situation?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes. If you put a tax on the importation of foreign oil, they will be greatly helped.

Mr. SCHAFER. By levying a 2 per cent tax on their refined oil at the refinery?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes; if you will put a tax on the importation of foreign oil.

Mr. SCHAFER. I asked about domestic oil, which is refined in domestic refineries.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I refuse to yield any further. I am making this speech. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman can not answer that, can he?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes. If you will put a tax on gasoline and keep foreign gasoline from being imported into this country, the men in this country who are producing American gasoline will be willing to pay a manufacturers' tax.

Mr. SCHAFER. Are they willing to pay it now?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Sure, they will if you shut out the importation of oil.

Mr. SCHAFER. Oh, if and but.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The Clerk read as follows:

For vehicle allowance, the hiring of drivers, the rental of vehicles, and the purchase and exchange and maintenance, including stable and garage facilities, of wagons or automobiles for, and the operation of, screen-wagon and city delivery and collection service, $16,500,000: Provided, That the Postmaster General may, in his disbursement of this appropriation, apply a part thereof to the leasing of quarters for the housing of Government-owned automobiles at a reasonable annual rental for a term not exceeding 10 years: Provided further, That this appropriation is available for the maintenance of the Government-owned post-office garage at Washington, D. C., including such changes and additions to the mechanical equipment as, in the opinion of the Postmaster General, may be necessary: Provided further, That the Postmaster General, during the fiscal year 1933, may purchase and maintain from the appropriation "Vehicle service" such tractors and trailer trucks as may be required in the operation of the screen-wagon and city delivery and collection service: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for maintenance or repair of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles for use in connection with the administrative work of the Post Office Department in the District of Columbia.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the paragraph. I want to ask the chairman whether the hearings disclose any testimony as to what is proposed by the department for operating the screen-wagon service by means of tractors and trailing trucks?

Mr. BYRNS. They only use them in certain places.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am seeking information—the use of tractors and trailing trucks seems to be an innovation in the postal operations.

Mr. BYRNS. I do not know that the hearings go into the particulars, but they only use them around docks, and probably in some of the larger post offices. The language has been carried in the bill for about three years.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is not purposed to have them operate generally through city streets?

Mr. BYRNS. Oh, no.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw my reservation of the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. No appropriation under the Treasury or Post Office Departments available during the fiscal year 1932 and/or 1933 shall be used after the date of the approval of this act (1) to increase the compensation of any position within the grade to which such position has been allocated under the classification act of 1923, as amended, (2) to increase the compensation of any position in the field service the pay of which is adjustable to correspond so far as may be practicable to the rates established by such act as amended for the departmental service in the District of Columbia, (3) to increase the compensation of any position under such act through reallocation, (4) to increase the compensation of any person in any grade under such act through advancement to another position in the same grade or to a position in a higher grade at a rate in excess of the minimum rate of such higher grade unless such minimum rate would require an actual reduction in compensation, or (5) to increase the compensation of any other position in the Federal Government under the Treasury or the Post Office Departments other than commissioned officers of the Public Health Service and commissioned officers, commissioned warrant officers, and enlisted men of the Coast Guard: Provided, That no additional credits for service shall be allowed to any commissioned officer in the Public Health Service or to any commissioned officer, commissioned warrant officer, or civilian instructor in the Coast Guard for purposes of base or period pay, or for longevity pay before July 1, 1933; any increase of base or period pay for length of service, or longevity pay, which would have been authorized under existing law before that date, shall become effective July 1, 1933, and not earlier, notwithstanding the provisions of any other act: Provided further, That so much of the act of May 29, 1928, as amended by the act of December 12, 1930 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 19, sec. 6a), as provides automatic increases in salary to clerks in the field service of the Customs Service, and so much of the acts of May 14, 1930 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 3, sec. 61), and July 1, 1930 (46 Stat. 839), as provide automatic increases in salary to privates of the White House police force, and so much of existing laws as provide automatic promotions for length of service to employees of the Postal Service, shall not be operative during the period between the date of the approval of this act and July 1, 1933: Provided, however, That this section shall not apply to postmasters or postal employees whose compensation is fixed, or from time to time adjusted, upon the basis of the postal receipts or other variable factor of business of their respective offices or to carriers in the rural mail delivery service whose compensation is fixed upon the basis of the length of their respective routes: Provided further, That from the date of this act to and including June 30, 1933, payment for personal services made in accordance herewith shall constitute payment in full for such services. The appropriations or portions of appropriations unexpended by the operation of this section shall not be used for any other purposes, but shall be impounded and returned to the Treasury, and a report of the amounts so impounded for the period between the date of the approval of this act and October 31, 1932, shall be submitted to Congress on the first day of the next regular session.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 65, line 18, strike out the words "commissioned warrant" and insert "chief warrant and warrant."

Mr. BYRNS. That is merely to clarify the language.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That will not preclude my offering a motion to strike out the section.

Mr. BYRNS. No; that is a perfecting amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the entire section.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I have a perfecting amendment which takes preference.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey is recognized to offer an amendment.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I offer the following amendment.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I will just take a minute in explanation of the amendment. Among the restrictions in the fixing of salaries of the civil-service employees governed by this appropriation bill is included this class: It prohibits any use of the appropriation by increasing the compensation of any person in any grade under such act through reallocation, but the only reason for reallocating an employee is when in the original allocation it was found to be a mistake or error.

Now, a person who has a certain set of duties to perform is classified in the first instance by the head of the department in the appropriate service and grade in that service, and he is limited to that range of salary. If it is alleged that an error has been made and he has been allocated to the wrong grade, the allocation is reviewed by the Personnel Classification Board. If an error has been made it is corrected. A person who is getting a salary through error and mistake, and it is attempted to do justice to him by correction of that error, ought not to be penalized; and the matter is of such small moment it would not make any appreciable difference in the pay roll. I think in the interest of simple justice this provision ought to be eliminated.

Mr. GARBER. And the correction referred to is the reallocation referred to in the bill.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, the departments have had since 1923 to take care of these errors if they have been made, and to which my friend from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] refers. It seems to me that is a long enough time to make adjustments. The gentleman says it amounts to very little. It cost about $1,000,000 last year. The facts are that when employees in the department here in Washington fail to get an increase, they bring all the influence they can upon the Personnel Classification Board to get a reallocation in order to get an increase. This simply means that for the year 1933 we are going to stop that practice and not increase the salary of anyone. This is identically the same provision that has been carried in four appropriation bills that have already passed this House, and certainly we do not want to discriminate in favor of one class of employees and against another. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Of course, what the gentleman says in respect to the opportunity since 1923 to correct errors and mistakes applies to those employees who were in the service in 1923, but from 1923 to 1932 many each year have entered the service under new appointments, and errors and mistakes in their initial allocation may have occurred.

Mr. BYRNS. In what I said I was not referring to any particular employee. I was talking about the position itself. They have had nine years in which to make these adjustments, not with reference to any particular individual, but with reference to these various positions. It seems to me under those circumstances that this language ought to be carried in this bill. If you do not carry it here, you are not doing what you did in the other appropriation bills, and this is in line with what you have done as to all of the other employees of the Government without the slightest protest. Why make an exception? Let us be fair with all.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BEEDY: Page 66, line 12, after the word "force," strike out the balance of the line and also lines 13, 14, 15, and all of 16 preceding the word "provided."

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Chairman, if I may have the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, this is the provision which has gone into all of these appropriation bills, and which, though consistent with the policy adopted by the committee, was not even suggested by the Bureau of the Budget. The gentleman from Tennessee, as he addressed the committee on the amendment just offered by the gentleman from New Jersey, said that the committee did not want to put itself in the position of discriminating against one class of employees and in favoring another.

Mr. BYRNS. Is not that what the gentleman is just now trying to do?

Mr. BEEDY. I do not think so. If he is, he does not know it.

Mr. BYRNS. We acted similarly in the case of employees in the State Department, so far as the Foreign Service is concerned. It has automatic promotions under the law. We acted in accordance with this in reference to the Coast and Geodetic Survey and also with reference to the Immigration Service. So my friend, who says he does not want to be inconsistent, and I am very certain he does not, certainly will be by this amendment, for he will discriminate in favor of the postal employees against these other classes of employees.

Mr. BEEDY. Did not the Senate throw these other provisions out when it came to consider them?

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman will remember that it was said on the floor of the Senate that those amendments were stricken out without prejudice. That was said by the chairman of the committee and the members of the committee. If the gentleman's amendment be adopted, then the gentleman is in the attitude of letting this go over there, and then if the other bills should carry this provision it would be impossible for the conferees to do in this bill what they do in the others.

Mr. BEEDY. I do not see how the Senate could have done otherwise than it did. I understand the provision which my amendment strikes out applies to the employees in the Postal Service who are getting between $1,700 and $2,000 a year. As I understand it, it does not affect anybody else. I am glad the gentleman exempted a class of postal employees that ought not to be affected by this, namely, rural carriers and others.

It may not be pleasing to the State Department, but I do not look on the employees in the State Department as being entitled to their automatic increases in salary quite as I do in the case of employees in the Postal Department whom this cut affects, namely, the men who carry the mail through the storms as well as in fair weather, and who stand on the substitute list for years realizing little or nothing in wages, but looking forward to the day when they may receive a permanent appointment and their automatic increases, which in part make up for their meager earnings as substitutes. State Department employees do not have to serve on any substitute list. This provision, expressing the policy of the committee, may be good economy, but I submit to the chairman that in this class of employees, when you take into consideration the fact that men give the best part of their lives getting in line for this service, waiting for years for the time when they will receive their automatic increases of $100 or so, only to find themselves disappointed, I say very frankly that it is a question in my mind whether the depletion of morale and incident inefficiency that follows from discouragement does not more than offset all the money that is saved.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEEDY. I yield.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I agree with the gentleman's idea, but the gentleman's amendment goes further than he intended, I believe.

Mr. BEEDY. Well, the amendment may not be accepted, but at least I have gained the opportunity to get my views before the committee.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. But the amendment should end with the word "service," instead of going on to line 15.

Mr. BEEDY. Now, may I ask the gentleman from Tennessee how much this provision in the bill saves?

Mr. BYRNS. This provision alone will save $1,250,000 in the year 1933, and I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that it is only a temporary expedient. It is only limited to 1933. I do not believe there is a postal employee in the United States Government who would not be willing to forego any increase in salary in these times, when we read in the papers that the bishops and others in the Episcopal Church have agreed to voluntary cuts, and when we read that the Presbyterian missions have reduced their salaries for some time. I do not think there is an employee of the Postal Service who would not be willing to forego the $100 increase in salary for the year 1933 in the interest of the taxpayers of this country.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute amendment for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD] offers a substitute amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute amendment offered by Mr. MEAD for the amendment offered by Mr. BEEDY: Page 66, line 12, after the word "force" strike out the comma and the rest of the language thereafter down to and including the comma after the word "service" in line 14.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I have offered has in mind safeguarding automatic increases provided by law, as it applies to the laborers in the Postal Service whose salaries range from $1,500 to $1,600. It also applies to the carriers in the village delivery service, whose salaries range from $1,150 to $1,250 per year. And it also applies to clerks and carriers in post offices of the first and second class—those men who begin with an initial salary of $1,700 and receive automatic promotions up to $2,100.

In my judgment, we should adopt this amendment, for these employees are the poorest paid in the Postal Service. They command your sympathy, for their meager incomes hardly enable them to live as employees of this great Government should live. These men are the underpaid employees of the Post Office Department. They have been until recently reporting for years as substitutes in the Postal Service, and during that period of time, ranging from 4 to 8 and 9 years, received compensation only for the actual time they were employed, with no allowance or credit for reporting.

Mr. HARE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HARE. Does this apply only to the substitutes?

Mr. MEAD. This applies to those men who in the last three or four years were substitutes and have recently received regular appointments.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. Yes; I yield to my colleague from New York.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. They are the lowest-paid men in the Postal Service that the gentleman is trying to help, are they not?

Mr. MEAD. Yes; the gentleman is correct. They are the lowest-paid employees in the Postal Service, and I believe we are deviating from a proper program of economy when we set out to exempt higher-salaried employees in this and other branches of the Government, and apply with undue severity our economy program on these, the lowest-paid men in the service. These men do the manual labor, they have the hardest jobs and do the worst kind of work under most unfavorable conditions, until such time as seniority will permit them to secure a better assignment.

Mr. BEEDY. The gentleman's amendment covers precisely the same class of employees which my amendment covered, except that it does not make the error my amendment did, of including language that was not necessary. Is that not the fact?

Mr. MEAD. Yes. It covers the same class of employees.

Mr. HARE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield.

Mr. HARE. Does this apply to substitutes also, who have not obtained regular employment?

Mr. MEAD. No. It will not cover them until such time as they secure a regular assignment. If, however, within the next 16 months they receive a regular assignment, it will then protect and cover them.

Mr. TIERNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. TIERNEY. Do I understand there is any change in the existing situation, that the highest-paid man in the service, who has been working for 10 years, a carrier or clerk, will be raised anyway under the present amendment?

Mr. MEAD. No. They will not be raised. This will not apply to them at all. This only applies to the newer employees of the department, the apprentices of the department.

Mr. TIERNEY. So if we leave it just as it is, there is no raise coming to the man who has been in the service for 10 years in any event?

Mr. MEAD. No. None whatever. This only covers a small percentage of the men in the service.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. It covers those men who, when they were appointed, received the appointment with the understanding that they would be given the automatic increases as provided by existing law until they reached the maximum salary paid such employees of the Postal Service.

Mr. MEAD. The gentleman is correct. Mr. Chairman, I think economy is essential and we ought to be very careful in the expenditure of public money, still I believe that when we try to reduce the salaries of our underpaid workers, those whose salaries will not permit them to live according to American standards, we are not economizing; we are retarding prosperity by further reducing the consuming power of our people. We are bringing about just the opposite effect we aim to bring about when by appropriating money for public work we seek to increase the buying power of our people and then we reduce the wages of those who barely receive a subsistence wage.

Until the American worker has the power to buy the products of the American farms and markets we will have no prosperity in these United States. Wages is but the power to buy. Let us not reduce this power in such meritorious cases as is the case we are considering. I hope the amendment prevails.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the Post Office Committee [Mr. MEAD] has well shown what, to my mind, is the distinct difference between the postal employees covered in his amendment and the employees covered in other appropriation bills with which we have already dealt. There is no inconsistency in adopting this amendment as far as the other department bills are concerned, and for this reason the Post Office Department has an entirely different system of employment than any other department. It is built on substitutes, or apprentices, who are the foundation element in the Postal Service. There are about 20,000 men in the substitute service getting a basic pay of 65 cents an hour for whatever work they actually perform. That pay in many cases, of course, is tragically low, when considered as yearly compensation.

Mr. HARE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. HARE. But I understood from the chairman of the committee a few moments ago that this does not apply to substitutes. I am anxious to know whether it does apply to them.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I am going to show how it directly applies. Ordinarily a substitute post-office clerk or letter carrier would make, I should say, $80 a month, on the basis of 65 cents an hour; but the reduction in the volume of mail has been such that now many of them are getting only a few dollars, and I think the average in the entire substitute service is around $35 a month at the present time. These men for years have been trying their best to get along on any kind of an emergency basis so that they might get regular employment and get into this automatic promotion line of $100 a year until they have reached the maximum of $2,100 a year.

The committee has been considerate in putting in a helping clause for substitutes on the next page of this bill. It provides that where there is eight hours of substitute service necessary daily the substitute must be appointed a regular employee. I hope that will be clarified so it will be made sure that when there is use for 44 hours' substitute service each week a substitute employee will get a regular appointment.

Mr. BYRNS. I have no objection to any amendment which will make that certain.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. That is a step in advance for which the committee deserves a great deal of credit, but it does not affect this provision for these automatic grades. Twelve thousand substitutes have been appointed to regular positions and they are now getting these lower-grade salaries of $1,700, $1,800, and $1,900. We have enacted a law providing that they shall only get certain increases and then they are through ordinarily for all time to come. That has meant that when a man goes into this service he knows just what he will get in the future.

Mr. McLEOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. McLEOD. Is it not a fact that all of these employees are merely postal carriers and not clerks?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. No; they are clerks and carriers and also railway postal clerks.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. WHITE. Is it not true that these men who render substitute service give a great deal of time to the study of postal matters during the time they are not at work?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is correct. They must report every day, and if they do not get anything to do they study distribution schemes. Our committee had a delegation of substitutes appear before it the other day, and we are trying to do something for them, but we find it difficult to work out any definite schedules of pay.

Mr. WHITE. The men who would be affected by this law are men who have just gotten out of this service.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Yes; and they have endured five or six years of very low pay. I hope the members of the committee will realize the difference between this service and Government service where a man goes in at the regular rate of pay the first day he goes on the job. There is a difference between an employee with that fixed compensation and one who waits five or six years before he even receives the pay of the lowest grade. Surely he should not be deprived of the small increase under the automatic promotions. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I do not know what my friends have against some of these other services. This provision applies to the Customs Service, and the men engaged in that service are certainly entitled to the same consideration as postal clerks.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. But the Customs Service does not have a substitute service for five years.

Mr. BYRNS. This does not have the slightest reference to the substitute service. Gentlemen, do not be misled by that sort of an argument. This would not apply to the substitute service, for the substitutes are not on the permanent roll. The gentleman just said that the average salary of a substitute is about $35 or $40 a month. He says when they are appointed to a $1,700 job it would apply after they had served a year; but do you not believe that a substitute who has served, as he says, four and five years, and in my home city for even longer, at $35 and $40 a month, on the average, would be entirely willing to wait for one year, in 1933 for an increase after an appointment to a position at $1,700 a year?

This is the plain proposition before you. Here is a provision which applies to the Customs Service and it applies to the White House police, and yet the gentleman offers an amendment here and undertakes to correct the amendment of the gentleman from Maine by excepting the Postal Service, but he does not offer to make the same exception for these other employees. The law applies to the Customs Service and the White House police, just as it does to post-office employees. Why make favorites of the postal employee in preference to the others? Let us be fair, let us be square about this. You know what is the matter and I know what is the matter. It is because of the influence back home that these gentlemen are undertaking to make an exception of the Postal Service. What position are you going to be in when you go back home and face your constituents with the fact that you stood firm and fast upon no increases for 1933 with reference to every employee of this Government who is entitled to his automatic increase under the law, but when it came to the Postal Service you yielded and made an exception of him. I say, gentlemen, let us be fair.

You voted this provision in in the State Department bill and neither the gentleman from Maine nor the gentleman from New York nor the gentleman from Pennsylvania rose to say anything about the automatic increases there. You voted this provision in in the Commerce Department bill and not one of these gentlemen rose to protest because we were striking out the automatic increases. That same provision applies to the immigration inspector in the Labor Department, and still not one of these gentlemen rose to his feet and said it was unfair not to give them these automatic increases.

Mr. BEEDY. Will the gentleman yield, since the gentleman makes specific reference to me?

Mr. BYRNS. Not now; I will yield in a minute.

But when we come to the postal clerks back home you are going to say to the country as representatives of the taxpayer, as men who are here to protect the Treasury, as men who next week are going to vote a tax upon practically everything that they and the entire people have to buy and nearly everything that they wear and nearly everything that they eat, that we made an exception of this class of employees and increased their salaries and paid no attention to the others.

Gentlemen, we have taken our stand, and the House has been commended all over this country for its efforts to effect economy. Why, I have just read a magnificent editorial in the New York Times which was published this morning which gave fulsome praise to the entire House for the economies that they had put into effect. Now, are we coming to the point, because we have postal clerks, if you please, back home and because they vote, that we are going to put ourselves in the position before the country of breaking our splendid record?

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three more minutes.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I believe the gentleman ought to have 5 minutes, and I think if he speaks 10 minutes we will pass the amendment.

Mr. BYRNS. Well, I never expect to influence the gentleman from Wisconsin by any appeal to his reason. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS. These Customs Service people and the immigration inspectors do not vote. The immigration inspectors are serving up on the border, and they do not vote because they are away on their duties, and nobody raised his voice, nobody was heard to say a word as to their automatic increases when we passed the bill the other day.

Now, why the distinction? It does not take a Solomon to tell you why this effort is being made to cut out this provision.

I am a friend of the Postal Service. You can go down to my home and every postal employee will tell you that I am his friend.

I want to tell you that the postal employees in my section of the country and from the great district from which I come are as anxious to conserve public money as any other class of citizens. They do not want to be made an exception. They are willing to give up this automatic increase of $100 for one year—no more—when farmers and when business men and when other classes of citizens are losing money in their business. They will get the same salary in 1933 that they got in 1932. Why should we make an exception of this class of employees and increase their salaries when we have taken a positive stand with reference to these other bills that we are not going to increase anybody's salary in the year 1933? Gentlemen, I do not believe you are going to do it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee, I am sure, wants to be fair with the Members of the House who have decided views on this question.

Mr. BYRNS. May I say that so far as I know the gentleman from New York is the only Member of the House who has raised his voice against this provision.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Oh, no. These gentlemen around me have been here voting with me. The gentleman from Tennessee knows that we had this provision in the Department of Agriculture bill, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZPATRICK]; also other gentlemen, including Messrs. MEAD, OLIVER, SWING, BOYLAN, HOGG, MCCORMACK—why, I can mention several scores of Members who voted for my amendment when I offered it on the Interior, Agriculture, State, and other department appropriation bills. There are a number of gentlemen on both sides of the aisle who voted with me when I made the motion to strike out the provision from the agricultural bill, and we were sustained in our judgment by the Senate Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BYRNS. There is no such provision as this in the agricultural bill, because there are no automatic increases.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But I am going to move to strike out the entire section. Why, the gentleman is in error. Subsections 1, 2, 3, and 4 are exactly as they were in the agricultural appropriation bill or in the Interior Department bill. The Senate committee has stricken it out. The gentleman says the Senate struck it out without prejudice. That is all any committee can do. Then the Interior Department appropriation bill came along, and then the State, Labor, and Commerce Departments bill came along, and I have consistently taken the floor and moved to strike this provision from the bill, because it is unfair, unjust, and unnecessary. You ought not to take away the hope of promotion from these employees, because it will imperil the morale.

You have provided for the Coast Guard and the Public Health Service, all contained in this bill. I am going to move to strike out the entire section. I have done it before, and shall continue to do it until the obnoxious provision is out of the bill. I am sure the gentlemen of the House have realized the purpose of the gentleman from Tennessee, and they are ready to vote on it, and the other body is going to sustain us in this, I am sure. I repeat what I have said so many times, that there is a decided organized movement in this country to reduce wages in industry and commerce, and the hope is to have the Government do the same as a justification to the exploiters of the wage earners.

The gentleman from Tennessee stated that would save only $635,000—that is all—out of a total expenditure of over $800,000,000. I submit that it is not only unwise because of our commitment, bad as to policy, and detrimental to our wage system, but it is going back on our word to maintain existing law. The automatic promotion in salary is part of our governmental system, and affects several services. If a $2,100 man dies, the place may not be filled. Others will not be moved up, and there will be general stagnation. Let that feeling of hopelessness prevail and it will demoralize any service. Yes; and if Congress then goes through with such a plan, it will be another drive for another reduction of wages throughout the country. Not only skilled and unskilled labor are being driven down, but the white-collar class is being so cut in wages as to make life almost unbearable. We must discourage this policy and not encourage it.

Mr. MEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. MEAD. Does not the gentleman see the fairness of my position?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Let me say the gentleman has presented his views in a very forceful way before the Committee on Appropriations and again here to-day, and the gentleman's argument here is unanswerable.

Mr. MCCORMACK. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the automatic increase in the Post Office Department is the only one where the men have to work four or five years before they receive a permanent appointment.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Of course, the Army and Navy and the Public Health Service—the first few years are pretty hard in those services as well.

Mr. TIERNEY. Is not it a fact that by an automatic cut they saved something like half a million dollars last year?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The only way to save the postal employees is to cut out the entire section. Unless we do, it will be an argument to put the postal employees back in the section. Yes; I am for treating all alike—but treating them all fairly and justly and not eliminate automatic or earned promotions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. And if sections 4 and 5 are adopted, will it not mean that the men in the substitute list will be making only $6 or $7 a week, with no chance to move up?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes. It is starvation wages, especially in our city. I serve notice on the committee now that immediately after this is voted on I shall move to strike out the entire section.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee enjoins it upon us that we be fair. The gentleman from Tennessee has had a great deal more experience in this body than I; but as I have been standing here waiting for order to be restored so that we could go on with the debate, I have been trying to think when I ever saw any Member on this floor try to do anything that I thought was unfair. I do not recall such an instance. We are all fair. We are all trying to do our duty as we see it. There is, to be sure, a question of fairness involved here, but it is from the other angle. There is an element of justice to postal employees with which we should be concerned. The gentleman says why did not the gentleman from Maine and the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise and cry out against the curtailment of these salaries for men in the case of the Coast Guard, the State Department, and the White House policemen? That is a different proposition entirely. I have supported the gentleman from Tennessee, and I shall support anybody in this House on a consistent and justifiable policy of economy, because it is absolutely necessary. There is no argument about that. When the gentleman from Tennessee brought in the bill that cut out the appraisers and the surveyors of ports I supported him, although two of the finest citizens in the State of Maine who are holding these positions at the port of Portland are to be the losers. Those gentlemen were fine enough not to lie down on me and ask me to come in here and argue against the curtailment. While I know these men at Portland, Me., have done work that is really for the best interest of the Customs Service, yet I know that their offices can be dispensed with. So I sat silent and cooperated with the gentleman. It was no pleasant task, but I faced the music.

When you come to discuss men in the State Department and the White House policemen and men in the Coast and Geodetic Survey, let me say that their situation is not comparable to that of postal employees to be affected by this proposed cut.

Let us get under the surface of things. Every member of the Postal Service who has stayed on the substitute list ever since we have had the classification act was content to accept his $25 or $35 a month, because he kept looking ahead for the day when, after he was put on the permanent list, he was going to get an automatic increase. That was in his view to be a part of his pay that he looked forward to as compensating him for the hardships and underpay that he put up with while on the substitute list. We had made, as it were, a special contract with these postal employees, and I submit it is not keeping faith to stand here under the plea of economy and let this provision stay in the bill. If we are going to be fair to these men and meet at least the moral obligation we owe them, here is the place and now is the time to stop this kind of cutting of salaries.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEEDY. Yes.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I understand also that this bill carries an increased appropriation of a million dollars and a half for foreign mail service because we have a contract with certain merchant marine operators.

Mr. BEEDY. Oh, in discussing the possibilities of economy I always hesitate to be too meticulous and to avoid that which is personal. I am taunted with not having risen here and lifted my voice against this provision in other bills.

I might call attention to the fact that when this House just a few days ago was appropriating $120,000,000 for road building—and the States have gone unjustifiably into debt throughout this country to build roads—I noticed the gentleman from Tennessee did not rise to lift his voice in the interest of economy and ask his side of the House not to make that appropriation. We are all fair, but it is a question of judgment in these problems. I will not condemn the gentleman from Tennessee for his stand on the $120,000,000 which did not have the recommendation of the Budget. He thought he was right. I think I am right now in the stand that I take. I hope the gentleman does not criticize me or impugn my motives.

Mr. BYRNS. Oh, I hope the gentleman will not get down to personalities. I think it is rather unfortunate that the gentleman puts himself in that attitude.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN [Mr. DELANEY]. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MEAD. I have submitted an amendment. I understand that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY] has an amendment and that Mr. LAGUARDIA will later offer another amendment. I am wondering whether we could not get a vote on my amendment now and devote the rest of the time allotted by the committee to a discussion of other amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman may withdraw his amendment and offer a perfecting amendment.

Mr. MEAD. And have it voted on right now?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. MEAD. I withdraw my substitute amendment and offer it as a perfecting amendment and ask for a vote.

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Chairman, in the interest of saving time I withdraw my amendment, so that we may have a clean-cut vote on the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the amendment of the gentleman from New York and the amendment of the gentleman from Maine will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer my amendment now as a perfecting amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MEAD: Page 66, line 12, after the word "force" strike out the comma and the rest of the language thereafter down to and including the comma after the word "service" in line 14.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BYRNS) there were—ayes 73, noes 27.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered and the Chair appointed Mr. BYRNS and Mr. MEAD as tellers.

The committee again divided, and the tellers reported there were—ayes 88, noes 41.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the entire section. Time is limited and I have already made my statement. I shall not consume any time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Page 64, beginning with line 23, strike out all of section 4 down to and including line 7 on page 67.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I congratulate my friend from New York, Mr. MEAD, for the victory that is now his. I think the amendment which the gentleman proposed was one of the most humane that could be proposed in an hour of economy. The ax of economy is a cruel ax. It knows no brother. If we wield that ax without discrimination or without humanity we are going to cause suffering in ranks that we want to aid.

The postal employee who is a substitute is really one of the unemployed. The charity of New York City is extended to him because he can not get enough from the little wage he receives as a substitute to sustain him and his family. Everywhere he seeks additional work, and yet in the morning he must go and report for his substitute's job, to be given an hour or two hours a day, with the mere pittance that he derives from that, or else he is dismissed from the list of substitutes. If we deprive him of an opportunity to get into the service after many years of that mere begging at the door of the Federal Government, hoping for a permanent job, we do what seems to me a cruel thing.

I do not question the fairness of my dear friend the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS]. No man in Congress has the affection and admiration of his fellows for his fairness, in a higher degree or in a more deserving degree than has the gentleman from Tennessee, but I say to him that he hardly knows conditions that prevail in the great cities, such as New York City. Those men have not appealed to me to sustain this bill. They have appealed to me to sustain the motion made by the gentleman from New York, Mr. MEAD, and the motion made by the gentleman from New York, Mr. LAGUARDIA. They have asked me to see that the whole scheme of putting the Government into a straitjacket on this proposition be stricken out, because the economies are not sufficient to justify them, in view of the humanities.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] is as fair a man as I know in the Congress, and yet his judgment can be mistaken. I do not believe that the Government should take the lead in salary decreases. The whole world of private industry is awaiting the leadership of the Government in salary deductions in order that they may destroy the American standard of living, and say, "We are but following the footsteps of the National Government."

Mr. BOYLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. I yield.

Mr. BOYLAN. If this bill prevails, with the language that is in it, would it not be a clear violation of contract on the part of the Government?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. I think it would be a violation of a moral agreement which led these men into service. Every man seeks a job and every man seeks promotion in due course. He seeks enough wage to give an opportunity to put something aside for his old age. We propose to destroy by the bill a promotion in due course, and once you take that from the scheme of things you take away the power that leads up to and gives life to the whole service, and you put into it a deadening thing which destroys the morale.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. I yield.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman be kind enough to call attention to the fact that we have provided for just a fraction of the employees in the amendment just adopted, and the amendment now before the committee would take care of the entire situation?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Yes. I agree with the gentleman, and I am glad he has taken such splendid leadership in a movement which I so heartily advocate.

Mr. STEWART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. I yield.

Mr. STEWART. Would not the same principle apply to some of these employees in the department?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Yes; it would. I do not think we save enough to justify us in destroying what we do destroy by the pending bill. You can take the heart out of the service by these petty reductions, which mean so much to them and so little in economy. So when you are balancing your books you have not done a lot for the Government when you have destroyed the spirit and the initiative of the whole service and when you have deprived men of the hope that they had that they would get a little more money if they gave good, loyal, 100 per cent service.

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman, this Congress has tried about every known method for improving the psychology of the country, recognizing the fact that psychology has more to do with the present depression and its continuance than any other single factor; yet to-day, here and now, in this section it is proposed to do exactly the opposite of what the President of the United States has repeatedly urged private business not to do, and that is to change from the normal course and to adopt an abnormal course in relation to employment, which is bound to react unfavorably, not only upon the employees of the Federal Government but likewise upon the entire public.

I say if it is right for the President to urge private industry not to discharge, not to cut down, and not to lay off its employees, but to go on in a normal way, then it is important that the Government itself, the biggest employer in the whole country, should set an example by treating its employees in a normal manner.

In normal years it is recognized that Government employees are notoriously underpaid, and if during these periods of depression their compensation seems to be slightly better, it is only a temporary advantage and will last for only a short time. However, even in normal times, there is not a single Government employee I know of who has ever been able to save anything out of his salary. Every bit of it goes as fast as he can get it.

We urge the country to go on normally; we want to reestablish normal psychology, normal living, normal buying, and normal investments, yet we ourselves are the first to upset normal conduct.

Life itself must go on, depression or no depression. Year after year children are born into the families of these Federal employees, and where there are already children they keep growing up as the years go by, bringing always an added cost for the purchase of shoes, for the purchase of clothes, for the purchase of food, and for their education. So there is an absolute need for these occasional increases in the pay of the employees.

This rule of automatic increases was adopted after mature thought. It has a sound basis for its existence in the law. It was adopted for the purpose of stimulating the efficiency of the service which the employees render the United States Government. To take it away from them will put discouragement and despair in the hearts of every one of them. It will break the morale of the Government employees. It will destroy the incentive to do their best work. In the long run this policy will not prove an economy. I warn that the few dollars and cents that will be saved by refusing them the normal increases we have promised for long and faithful service will cost the United States Government more than it saves by reason of inefficient and indifferent service that is bound to follow. Let us keep our promise to them and carry out the contract we made to give them from time to time these small increases which they have earned and which they so badly need. [Applause.]

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Chairman, I am in sympathy with this amendment. I am for economy, and I am for balancing the Budget, but I do not believe this means economy in the long run. [Applause.]

I agree with the statement made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. OLIVER] that if you want to practice real economy and at the same time be honest and consistent, let us begin at the top rather than at the bottom. [Applause.] Let us start in by reducing salaries from the President down, if that be necessary, including our own, rather than picking out the very lowest paid of the Government employees.

I do not subscribe to the statements made by some gentlemen that there was a direct contractual obligation entered into between the Government and these postal and customs employees. I do not say that, but I do say there is a moral obligation; that these men went into the Government service with the law as it then existed and were told, "After you have served a certain time there shall be an automatic increase of $100 per year." Those men having been told that, I do not think this is the time to destroy individual initiative and ambition by putting them in a position where they will not be as enthusiastic or as efficient as they otherwise might be. Uncle Sam should always deal in good faith with his employees.

My position has been such during the last four or five years that I have had more or less dealings with postal employees and customs officers. In my city of El Paso there are a great many Government employees, many of them being engaged in the Customs Service. Those customs men are serving along the wild Mexican border. I could not count on the fingers of my two hands the men in the Customs Service who have been killed in the last five years. No braver men live, and they take their lives in their hands every day. I happen to know men who have quit better-paid employment, which they feared might be more or less temporary, in order to seek what they regarded as permanent employment, as well as an employment that promised some hope of promotion.

I do not think we should pick out men drawing $1,700 or $1,800 as the ones who are to be reduced or have no promotion. I know that many of these men have families of four or five children, and I do not think we should take away from them the $100 to which they are entitled after struggling for it for five years or more. If we want to reduce let us begin with salaries in the high brackets. We should not single out these men who are entitled to this $100 merely because we want to economize. They are entitled to it, both in law and equity, and I do not believe this is the proper place to begin the so-called program of economy.

I am not only loyal to the committee, but I stand here for absolute economy, and I believe my record will so show. I think, however, that under all the circumstances, those men in the Postal Service who day in and day out, in the rain or in the sunshine, bring to us our mail, whether it be from business friends or from loved ones, should be given that which has been promised to them. In effect, we entered into a solemn compact with them that after a certain number of years of service they would be increased by this $100 per year. The Senate struck this provision from the bill, and now we should do the same. Most of these men have families, draw about $1,700 per year, and are the lowest-paid men in Government service. They worked about two or three years as substitutes at $50 per month. Let us be just before we are economical; and if we have to do any salary cutting, let us start in with the big boys. [Applause.]

Mr. HOGG of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, before I came to Washington last fall I had an interview with a very wealthy man who said to me, "This depression must mean one thing to the American people. It must mean that wages be forced down to where they should be."

A few years ago there was a well-known man who was reported to have said, "A man was worth a dollar a day from his shoulders down, but he is worth as much above his shoulders as he is able to collect."

I do not subscribe to any such false philosophy. I will vote to reduce my salary and your salary as well as the salaries of all higher-paid Government employees. The RECORD will show that I am for every economy. But, Mr. Chairman, I shall never subscribe to any legislation which tends to liquidate this depression on the wages of the men and women who toil for their bread. [Applause.]

This depression was brought on, in part, by people who were seeking profits that they did not earn. We should not turn to the wages of men and women who toil for the comforts of life in order to find a way out of the trouble we are in.

I am for this amendment. [Applause.]

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, my remarks will be very brief. I just want to say that I have a great deal of affection and respect for my colleague [Mr. BYRNS], but I am sorry I can not go along with him on this matter.

I think, as so many of the gentlemen have so well said here to-day, that this is a wrong way to economize. I believe in economy, but not to the extent of creating human misery. I happen to have a number of letters from the wives of some of these employees who would be affected by the provision in this bill, and I think if you gentlemen could read the letters I have received you would understand that we would really be doing a very great injustice to a great number of faithful employees in putting through such a provision. Perhaps some of you have received these letters, but being a woman, I think women write a little more intimately, perhaps, to a woman Representative, and I know that my heart has been touched by the appeals that have been made to me. I want to say further that I am entirely in agreement with my friend [Mr. LAGUARDIA] in this regard and hope that his amendment shall prevail. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I have no more interest in this amendment than any other Member on the floor of this House. I made a solemn pledge to myself when I came here in December that I was going to do what I could to stand by the President of the United States in his effort to balance the Budget [applause], and I can stand here to-day and say I have worked day and night, and the other gentlemen upon the Committee on Appropriations of which I am a member have done the same thing, in an effort to hold down the appropriations.

I have no personal interest in this question. There is not a man in the Nashville post office who is not my personal friend, and, certainly, I do not want to see any man there or elsewhere injured in any degree; but I say to you gentlemen in this period of time when the farmers—and you will notice that most of those who are supporting this amendment do not come from the country—when the farmers of this country find it impossible to make enough to pay the cost of production upon their farms——

Mr. MAY. Or taxes.

Mr. BYRNS. Or even, as the gentleman from Kentucky suggests, the taxes which they have to pay, when business men are failing and banks are failing, when the deficit has reached the point that this Committee on Ways and Means has been sitting for weeks and weeks in an effort to find something they can tax in order to balance the Budget, when you are going to come in here next week and impose a tax upon practically everything that the postal clerks and everybody else wears and eats, it is no time to increase salaries.

Now, gentlemen have talked about this as if it were a reduction of salary. It does not reduce anybody's salary. It simply provides that for the year 1933 nobody shall receive an increase.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes, briefly.

Mr. MAY. In view of the numerous appropriations made by this Congress for the past 10 years and the present condition of the Treasury of the United States, I would like to know if the gentleman could give the House a modern, up-to-date definition of the meaning of the phrase "funds not otherwise appropriated" at the beginning of this act?

Mr. BYRNS. If we keep up at this rate, the time is coming when there will not be any funds to appropriate.

I was much disappointed a while ago. This is no more to me than it is to you. I do not impugn the motives of any gentleman who votes against me on any proposition. He may be right and I may be wrong. I look at all such matters as having two sides, but this House has uniformly stood for every proposition looking to economy. You have voted exactly this language, as the gentleman from New York knows, in every appropriation bill that you have passed.

Are you going to vote it out of this? If so, why? Why are you going to make fish of one and fowl of another? Remember, this means no reduction in salary, it only applies, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD] said, to comparatively few—those who graduate from substitutes into the $1,700 class. I do not know whether they would get it in the first year's salary, but, if so, it would only amount to $100 increase. Why can not this be delayed for just one year?

I want to tell you that I have more confidence in the patriotism and loyalty of the postal clerks of this country than some of the gentlemen here seem to have, when they say that the adoption of this policy will break the morale of the postal clerks. I do not believe it for a moment. I want to tell you that the postal clerks of this country are loyal, they are patriotic, they are not going to ask you to make an exception of them when you have applied this provision to the other services in the Government. They do not ask you to make a distinction in their favor.

Gentlemen, I appeal to you. You have passed this measure in other bills. It was put into the other bills, and nobody opposed it except the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. There were others who voted with me.

Mr. BYRNS. Yes; but nobody except the gentleman from New York raised his voice in opposition, and it was exactly the same provision.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by several Members), there were 72 ayes and 60 noes.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. BYRNS and Mr. LAGUARDIA as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were 74 ayes and 65 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. No appropriation under the Treasury or Post Office Departments available during the fiscal years 1932 and/or 1933 shall be used after the date of the approval of this act to pay the compensation of an incumbent appointed to any position under the Federal Government which is vacant on the date of the approval of this act or to any such position which may become vacant after such date: Provided, That this inhibition shall not apply (1) to absolutely essential positions the filling of which may be approved in writing by the President of the United States, (2) to the commissioned and enlisted personnel of the Coast Guard, or (3) to temporary, emergency, seasonal, or cooperative positions: Provided, That when any vacancy is caused by the retirement, removal, resignation, or death of a postal employee in a position the duties of which make it necessary to assign permanently a substitute for an 8-hour daily period, or when it is necessary permanently to utilize a substitute on an auxiliary route for eight hours daily, then the Postmaster General shall so advise the President and request written authorization to fill such vacancies by the appointment of additional regular employees. The appropriations or portions of appropriations unexpended by the operation of this section shall not be used for any other purposes but shall be impounded and returned to the Treasury, and a report of all such vacancies, the number thereof filled, and the amounts unexpended, for the period between the date of the approval of this act and October 31, 1932, shall be submitted to Congress on the first day of the next regular session.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 67, line 20, after the word "Provided," strike out all of the remainder of the line down to and including the word "employees" on line 3, page 68, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That when any vacancy is caused by the retirement, removal, resignation, or death of a postal employee in a position the duties of which make necessary the use of approximately 44 hours' substitute service per week, or when it is necessary permanently to utilize substitute service on an auxiliary route for approximately 8 hours daily, then the Postmaster General shall so advise the President and request written authorization to fill such vacancy by the appointment of additional regular employees."

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I have no power to speak for the committee, but, so far as I am concerned, I have no objection to agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD]. He is seeking to do the same thing that we seek to do, and if his amendment clarifies the matter I am happy to have it adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. No part of any money appropriated by this act shall be used for purchasing any motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicle (except busses, station wagons, and ambulances) at a cost, delivered and completely equipped for operation, in excess of $750, including the value of a vehicle exchanged where exchange is involved; nor shall any money appropriated herein be used for maintaining, driving, or operating any Government-owned motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicle not used exclusively for official purposes; and "official purposes" shall not include the transportation of officers and employees between their domiciles and places of employment except in cases of officers and employees engaged in field work the character of whose duties makes such transportation necessary and then only when the same is approved by the head of the department. This section shall not apply to any motor vehicle for official use of the Secretary of the Treasury or the Postmaster General.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Goss: Page 68, line 15, after the word "delivered," insert the following: "f. o. b. factory."

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, this is the same section that has been in all of the bills, and I offer this amendment because it has been said on the floor of the House that it would not be possible to buy a Ford, a Chevrolet, or a Plymouth automobile in the far Western States for $750, delivered and completely equipped. There is no intention upon my part to raise the price beyond a reasonable freight allowance from the factories. I think the committee intended to put this amount at $750 so that it would count out the higher priced cars. I ask the chairman of the committee whether he is agreeable to accepting this amendment. The freight allowance would not be over $200, and it would allow the cheaper cars to be purchased anywhere in the United States.

Mr. BYRNS. Would not the gentleman be willing to allow this matter to be passed and have it go to the Senate and then be taken up in conference, as will be done with the other provisions respecting automobiles in other bills, so that it can be arranged with some degree of uniformity? If gentlemen want to have a hodgepodge of their appropriation bills, and if they want to change one when they do not change another, of course, I can not prevent it.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman give his cooperation in conference?

Mr. BYRNS. Certainly it will be given every consideration, though I will not promise the gentleman that I will agree to a raise.

Mr. GOSS. If the gentleman will not agree to a raise so that we can get the automobile delivered, then I shall insist upon my amendment.

Mr. BYRNS. The attitude of the committee is that we want to take care of the Treasury. We are looking to the interest of the taxpayers and of the Treasury rather than to the interest of the automobile manufacturers.

Mr. GOSS. Does the gentleman want to have motorcycles used for this purpose?

Mr. BYRNS. I assure the gentleman that the service will not be interfered with, it will not be disturbed in the slightest, but we will not have the spectacle of Government employees riding in handsomer cars than nine-tenths of the Members of Congress, at the expense of the Government.

Mr. GOSS. The gentleman should know that the amendment providing $750, f. o. b. factory, would not allow of any expensive cars.

Mr. BYRNS. But we are trying to perfect this provision and all automobile provisions, in order to cut out some of the Packards and Cadillacs that are being used at the expense of the Government.

Mr. GOSS. I agree with the gentleman. I simply make the price f. o. b. at the factory.

Mr. HART. Does not that apply to any other car?

Mr. GOSS. Yes; but the price of $750 is the delivered price, including the whole car, freight, and equipment. All my amendment proposes to do is to make the price $750 f. o. b. factory.

Mr. HART. That would be too high for the lower priced cars.

Mr. GOSS. Oh, no. The argument has been made that out West they could not buy automobiles for that price.

Mr. BYRNS. Why not let these matters be threshed out in conference, so that we can have some uniformity with reference to these appropriations.

Mr. GOSS. I would be willing, but the gentleman will not give his assurance that he would go to even $750.

Mr. BYRNS. I am not going to give the gentleman any assurance in advance. I think the gentleman may trust me to do the reasonable thing; but I say this to the gentleman and to the members of the committee, that as a member of the conference committee I am not going to stand for a proposition which means that the Government has to pay a dollar more than is necessary for any car needed by Government employees.

Mr. GOSS. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSS. Yes.

Mr. KVALE. The gentleman's amendment proposes to make sure the statement given to the House that in the consideration of a like amendment in a former appropriation bill that was to the effect that the freight expense would be taken out of the contingent fund.

Mr. GOSS. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read the bill down to and including line 15, on page 69.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOWARD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9699) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

TREASURY AND POST OFFICE DEPARTMENTS APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. TIERNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. TIERNEY. Mr. Speaker, I believe the present status of so-called automatic promotion in the Postal Service should remain as is and not be cut down as proposed in lines 13 and 14, page 66, of H. R. 9699, appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments.

It is well to first call attention to the fact that under the present law no promotions for carriers and clerks and substitutes carry any more than the present top salary of $2,150 a year. It requires 10 years' service to reach this pay, and the existing law does not allow for any further advance.

The situation as to substitute carriers is, they are working for 65 cents an hour, or approximately $1,350 a year. If they work steadily into position of juniors in the service at around $1,700 or $1,800 a year they obtain $100 a year advancement until they reach the $2,150 class and there stop.

The system of graduated increase up to a limit has been in force under a well-worked-out system in the Post Office Department for many years. It would disrupt this system if it were now changed.

We must keep in mind that there have already been substantial cuts and savings in the Postal Service. For example, over one-half million dollars has been saved in the cutting of around 5,000 salaries of postmasters and supervisors, whose pay is proportional to the volume of business passing through the office; this volume is decreased on account of the depression. There has been also a large saving through the recent policy of the Post Office Department in being rather slow in making promotions and using a substitute wherever possible.

We should keep in mind that from 1912 to 1925 the clerks, carriers, and substitutes, numbering perhaps over 150,000 in the United States, received no increase in pay. The highest pay during that period was approximately $1,200 a year. Many of these men are men of families, all American citizens; many are struggling under debts incurred in endeavoring to sustain themselves under lower pay and until they reach the ultimate goal now set.

I know of no harder working branch of the Government service than the carriers and clerks. There is no sinecure or soft berth connected with their work.

I do not believe there is any public support calling for such change in the system and the public at large will surely lose in a service that is so necessary; and of all services in the United States this ought to be kept up to a high effective plane.

May I read a letter received this morning from Mr. George H. Pfeil, president, branch 35, United National Association Post Office Clerks, calling attention to one post office in Connecticut where there are 15 clerks substituting, working at 65 cents an hour, doing the work of a $1,700 or $2,100 a year man, many of them for five or six years without promotion.

I believe the existing law should be left as is, especially having in mind that there is no provision for promotion for the man who has been 10 years in the service and that the other promotions are not really promotions in the sense but are really a graduated form of pay which the clerks, carriers, and substitutes have been led to believe would be a permanent system and one that they could build on for their future.

Many other avenues for cuts in various interlocking departments at Washington, and obsolete systems could be looked into to save money, instead of penalizing our hard-working effective postal employees in the lower grades.

UNITED NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF POST OFFICE CLERKS,
New Haven, Conn., February 29, 1932.

Hon. WILLIAM L. TIERNEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: In justice to the 15 clerks out of 175 on the rolls of the New Haven (Conn.) Post Office who are due for the automatic promotion of $100 during the fiscal year 1933, may we respectfully beg you to oppose any change in the present law which would suspend the promotions for a year or more.

It is our understanding that the Treasury and Post Office supply bill will contain the proviso recommended by the Committee on Appropriations, suspending all promotions for the next fiscal year.

Owing to the financial condition of the Treasury at the present time, we can readily appreciate the necessity of strict economy and the withholding of promotions to the supervisory positions and to grades above the automatic grades. However, we do feel that an injustice will be done the employees in the automatic grade if this provision were adopted. In some instances these employees have served as substitutes for five or six years, under adverse working conditions, before being appointed regular employees, with the expectation of regular promotion when appointed.

We trust that you will give the matter your usual sincere consideration and will be able to give your valuable support to sustaining the present law, allowing these employees the promotions which they have earned.

With the kindest regards, I am, respectfully,

GEORGE H. PFEIL,
President Branch 35, United National Association of Post Office Clerks.

TREASURY AND POST OFFICE DEPARTMENTS APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, the amendment to section 5 offered by Mr. MEAD, of New York, meets with my approval. Legislation of this kind is badly needed to correct a situation confronting the substitutes in the Brooklyn and other post offices in the country. The substitutes in my home city of Brooklyn have been forced into the army of unemployed. There are two reasons for this: First, a falling off in postal revenues; and, secondly, the restrictive employment policies of the Post Office Department. Very unfortunately, the Postmaster General and the First Assistant Postmaster General, at a time when there is so much unemployment in our country, are endeavoring to take work away from post-office substitutes by instituting petty economies, such as the lengthening of the working hours of the regular clerks. This can be done under a technical interpretation of the 8-hour law. This law provided that the 8-hour service of regular clerks and carriers must be performed within 10 hours. Ordinarily it is performed within 9 hours. But Mr. Coleman, the First Assistant Postmaster General, has instructed postmasters to lengthen the hours to 8 within 10, which operates to rob the substitutes of work opportunities.

In other words, the regular clerks are required to work longer hours, and in so doing they take away employment chances for the substitutes. I wish to call the attention of the House to a communication I have been informed was sent by First Assistant Postmaster General Coleman under date of November 5, to all postmasters, instructing them to reduce substitute service by lengthening the tours of regulars to 8 within 10 hours:

You are directed to immediately reorganize your forces and reduce substitute service to the minimum. You are authorized to make such changes in the assignments and tours of clerks and carriers as will enable you to render good service to the public, with as little auxiliary assistance as possible. Full advantage is to be taken of the 8-in-10-hour law.

BROOKLYN SUBSTITUTES

So acute is the unemployment situation among the Brooklyn substitutes that they have made public appeals for support to obtain corrective legislation. They are seeking enactment of bills sponsored by three members of the House Post Office Committee, namely, Representatives KELLY, HOGG, and SWEENEY. The public appeal of the Brooklyn substitutes reads:

These bills would guarantee to substitutes 30 hours of work a week, a sick leave, and a vacation with pay. Substitute postal clerks have suffered severely from present economic conditions. In the past they were appointed to the regular force after a brief trial period. To-day they must substitute indefinitely, with little hope of such appointment.

Most of them are married men and have several who are dependent upon them for support from the very inadequate remuneration they receive. Enactment into law of the relief measures depends upon favorable public sentiment and interest.

Petitions in behalf of the Brooklyn substitutes signed by thousands of citizens of my city have been sent to the House Post Office Committee.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MURPHY, at the request of Mr. CABLE, on account of sickness.

To Mr. WOLFENDEN, for the balance of the week, at the request of Mr. BRUMM, on account of illness.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SATURDAY, MARCH 5, 1932

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, we thank Thee for that love which measures itself by suffering for the poor and needy and heartbroken. Go forth, O love divine, and make Thy disclosures by which men are redeemed from the lower spheres of human life. O break upon them in the fullness of Thy power until it shall incite them to things beautiful and holy. Save us from the bondage and proscription which are of the sinful levels of society. Lead us upward in the spiritual and intellectual life in which unbounded faith, hope, and love bestow their choicest blessings. O God, stand behind every weeping soul; be not far away from every distressed orphan; be near every oppressed widow in the hour of her trial, and remember all Thy children of weakness and want. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 110) authorizing the distribution of Government-owned wheat to the American National Red Cross and other organizations for relief of distress.

TREASURY AND POST OFFICE DEPARTMENTS APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9699) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Treasury and Post Office Departments appropriation bill, with Mr. HOWARD in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FULMER: Page 69, line 6, after the word "act," insert the following: "or appropriations hereafter made."

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, I note with a great deal of interest that the language contained in section 7 is practically identical with that contained in a bill which I introduced in the earlier part of the session, H. R. 5612.

I will state for the information of the committee that the bill introduced by me has already been reported by the Post Office Committee and is now pending on the calendar. I may state also that I have a favorable report from the Post Office Department on this legislation. The adoption of this amendment will accomplish what I seek to accomplish under my bill.

This legislation also meets with the approval of the President of the United States, according to a statement made by him some time ago. I would like to have the Clerk read this statement, which was issued some time in January.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the statement.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

It would be of substantial advantage to American manufacturers and purchasers if Congress should authorize all departments and executive establishments uniformly to give preference in purchase of supplies to goods of domestic origin, and I suggest the enactment of legislation providing that in advertising for proposals for supplies heads of departments shall require bidders to certify whether the articles proposed to be furnished are of domestic or foreign growth, production, or manufacture, and shall (if in their judgment the excess of cost is not unreasonable) purchase or contract for the delivery of articles of the growth, production, or manufacture of the United States, notwithstanding that articles of foreign origin may be offered at a lower price.

Mr. FULMER. This same type of legislation was passed some two years ago for the War and Navy Departments. At that time in requesting bids on matches they had a lower price submitted by foreign countries, and they had to give their orders for matches which were imported rather than use those made in this country.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULMER. Yes.

Mr. JONES. I would like to state to the gentleman that I think this is a good amendment. As a matter of fact, a number of us, including the gentleman from South Carolina, had this matter up with the Post Office Department last summer. As I recall, they stated they would use cotton twine, but for some reason they backed up on the proposition.

Mr. FULMER. The reason the department decided to use jute twine is that under the present law the department is forced to accept the lowest bid, regardless of where the product is grown or manufactured. Mr. Brown, the Postmaster General, told me that if my bill had been the law at that time he would have used cotton twine, even though the price was some higher than jute.

Mr. JONES. As a matter of fact, it would make very little difference in the cost.

Mr. FULMER. That is right, especially at this time, when cotton is so cheap.

Mr. JONES. What they are now using is a jute product made in India, thus giving preference to foreign products over the domestic cotton twine which is made in this country.

Mr. FULMER. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULMER. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The language of the amendment offered by the gentleman is the same as that which was included in his bill before the Post Office Committee.

Mr. FULMER. The amendment will accomplish what I proposed to accomplish with my bill that the gentleman refers to. I understand that the Post Office Department is now faced with buying foreign gasoline because it had to accept the lowest bid.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULMER. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. I would like to have the amendment again reported. There was some confusion in the Chamber, and many of us did not hear it.

Mr. FULMER. May I state before that is done that I have had this matter up with several members of the Appropriations Committee, including the chairman, and there is no objection to this amendment, as far as I understand?

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, may the amendment be again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. FULMER. I do not see how any Member can object to this amendment, so I will not take any more of the time of the committee.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULMER. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. The gentleman's amendment reads "or appropriations hereafter made." What about bills that have passed heretofore?

Mr. FULMER. As I have stated, some two years ago the bills providing appropriations for the War and Navy Departments contained this same legislation.

Mr. GOSS. What about bills providing appropriations for other departments which have already passed the House?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the gentleman will permit, the word "hereafter" makes it permanent legislation.

Mr. GOSS. But, as I understand, as to the bills which have already passed, this would not be effective.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. This language would have been subject to a point of order, but if this amendment is adopted it makes it permanent legislation.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULMER. Yes.

Mr. JONES. I think the committee should accept this amendment, or, at least, not make any objection to it. I can see no reason on earth why we should prefer foreign commodities to American commodities.

Mr. BYRNS. If the gentleman will permit me to reply to that, I will say this: The gentleman from South Carolina did me the honor to speak to me about this amendment two or three days ago. I told him that as far as I was concerned I did not have the slightest objection to it. Of course, I had no authority to accept the amendment on behalf of the committee. As the gentleman from New York says, this amendment would make it permanent law. The committee has recommended it for 1933, but this makes it permanent law.

Mr. FULMER. I thank the gentleman from Tennessee, and will not take any more time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. The United States Bureau of Efficiency is authorized and directed to prepare and submit to Congress on the first day of the next regular session a report showing the make, year, type, annual mileage, useful purpose, assignment, and other similar pertinent information relative to each Government-owned passenger automobile and motor boat in the custody of the several field services on June 30, 1932, and shall indicate appropriately in such report which of such vehicles were forfeited to the United States for violation of law.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the language in line 23, "shall indicate appropriately in such report which of such vehicles were forfeited to the United States for violation of law."

I hope the committee will be willing to strike out the word "appropriately," so that it would not be possible for the department to put the names and addresses of the violators of law that have lost their automobiles. If they just simply want this indicated and are willing to strike out the word "appropriately," I shall not press my point of order.

Mr. BYRNS. I will say to the gentleman the committee had only one purpose in making this recommendation, and that is to secure information by next December as to the number of automobiles and their types that are in Government use throughout the country. We are not interested in the names of those who formerly owned them, and it is not the intention of the provision to collect their names and publish them, because this would be an expense that I would criticize, as well as the gentleman himself. I am perfectly willing to move that the word "appropriately" be stricken from the bill.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that the gentleman is going to offer that amendment, I withdraw my point of order.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the word "appropriately," in line 23, page 69, be stricken from the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. No part of any appropriation made by this act shall be used to pay the actual expenses of subsistence in excess of $6 each for any one calendar day or per diem allowance for subsistence in excess of the rate of $5 for any one calendar day to any officer or employee of the United States, and payment accordingly shall be in full, notwithstanding any other statutory provision.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, we have concluded the reading of the bill. I am not going to take up the time of the committee, because this matter was discussed at very great length on yesterday, but I do want to call the attention of those who were not here on yesterday during the discussion to the effect of the amendment which was adopted yesterday striking out section 4.

This section, according to the Postmaster General, meant a saving in the Post Office Department alone of $1,200,000 for the year 1933, and in order that no one may doubt my accuracy on this point, I want to read you just what Mr. Brown, the Postmaster General, said in response to a question from me:

The CHAIRMAN. Can you tell us how much of these estimates for 1933 is due to automatic promotions?

Mr. BROWN. It runs a little over $1,200,000 a year.

Now, the action of the committee upon yesterday struck out this section, and those who vote aye when the matter comes up in the House are going to be on record—I think we all should understand this—as having voted to add to the cost of government $1,200,000 a year, not to prevent a reduction in salary but to provide increases in salary. It has been my understanding from the beginning that the Members of the House, many of whom are opposed to reductions in salary, are equally opposed to making any increases in 1933 for obvious reasons.

I want to give warning to those who profess to be the friends of the Postal Service that you could not do anything, in my judgment, which would more certainly promote the movement in favor of an actual reduction in salaries than to vote for this amendment putting on these increases for 1933. [Applause.] I say that those who vote to restore section 4 of the bill are the real friends of the Postal Service and the real friends of all the employees of this Government, because you can rest assured that when your tax bill comes in next week and the people realize—not through speculation but as a matter of fact—that they are going to be confronted with an immense tax bill, which is going to tax nearly everything they eat and nearly everything they wear and nearly everything they use, you can rest assured there is going to be even further protest over the country in the interest of economy.

Gentlemen, let me close with this remark. The Committee on Appropriations worked out this scheme to prevent increases—not reductions, but to prevent increases in salaries during the year 1933.

Mr. KELLER. And it does not go beyond that?

Mr. BYRNS. It does not go beyond the year 1933 but is simply for that year.

These provisions have gone on every other bill. Strike it out of this bill and you are going to exempt employees of the Treasury and the Post Office Departments and leave the House in a position where it was willing to impose this restriction upon the employees of every other department of this Government; and I want to say to you further, as earnest as I am in the advocacy of the proposition, that there shall be no increases; I want to be fair with everybody. I want to be on the level with every class of employees, and if you strike this provision from this bill and exempt the Treasury and Post Office Departments, I am frank to say to you, much as I would hate to do it, I am in favor of eliminating that section as to every other department of this Government. When you do that you add several million dollars to the cost of government for 1933 for increases. I hope that when we come to vote the House will not put itself on record in favor of it. [Applause.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair first recognizes the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. ABERNETHY].

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Chairman, I want to back up 100 per cent what the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] has said on this bill. I think the postal employees are making a great mistake in pressing this matter. That is all I wish to say.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] suggests that if we eliminate this section from the bill the Treasury and postal employees will be in a better position than the employees coming under other departments. May I call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee to the fact that this same amendment has been eliminated by the Senate committee in connection with the bills of the Interior Department and the Agricultural Department now before the Senate, and that they were reported with the recommendation that these sections be eliminated from the bills. So much for that.

Now, there are two classes of employees to be considered. This is not a salary increase. This concerns the class of employees, such as the Postal Service, the Geodetic Survey, Public Health, the Army, and the Navy, where the salaries are fixed at the outset of the employment—a yearly scale depending upon the years of service. That constitutes a solemn contract written into our basic law affecting this character of employment.

The gentleman from Tennessee the other day told the House that there were certain features in the air mail contract that he did not like, but it was a contract and we could not rescind it. The same is true here. These salaries are fixed by years of service, by longevity, under solemn contract.

The proposition is simply this, that if any employee dies or retires or is removed from the service and another employee is moved to that position, that employee takes the salary of the minimum of that grade. How can we remove all hope of promotion, all hope of advancement in any department of the Government any more than in any other walk of life?

And, gentlemen, there is a greater significance. I announced at the time the first proposition was before the House that the American Congress is being used by a determined movement of the big financial interests of this country to tear down the wages of the working people and make them pay the entire cost of the miserable depression they themselves have brought about. [Applause.]

If by accident any of these amendments—I do not believe they will be continued in the bill—is approved by the Senate, every owner of a scab shop will immediately pounce upon such an unfortunate eventuality and use it as his alibi to further tear down wages. It is that condition that I am protesting against.

Let me also point out—and if I am not correct in this, I want the gentleman from Tennessee to correct me—this reduction from the total amount appropriated was not recommended in the Budget. Listen, you Republicans, this reduction was not recommended by your Budget.

Mr. BYRNS. If the gentleman will permit, the President is on record, and recommends holding down appropriations, and has given his full approval to not making promotions.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We do not need this legislation, and the President of the United States never said in his message, or in any other manner, that he wanted to disregard the solemn contracts written into the law providing for the salaries of this class of employees.

Mr. BYRNS. Then we have the President on record as saying that he is not in favor of an increase of salaries.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. This is not an increase in salaries. As I said, there are two classes, one with contract salaries legally fixed each year and the other is the question of ordinary routine promotions when a vacancy occurs.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the proposition suggested in the way of an amendment by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA]. I do that as a friend of the postal employees of this country. [Applause.] No one can truthfully say that during my service here I have not been most friendly with the employees of the Postal Service. In what I am saying to-day I am satisfied that I again speak as their friend. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] says that the Government has entered into an agreement with the postal employees promising them increases in salaries and promotions, and that if this bill is passed without adopting his amendment that this will break faith with these employees. The postal employees are not unreasonable. We have no more patriotic group of citizens, and they realize that in these days of storm and stress that they are fortunate to have positions, and I can not conceive of them, after mature deliberation, insisting on any kind of increases at this time. The man who has any kind of a job is fortunate, and doubly fortunate is he who holds the same position which he held in prosperous times and still draws the same salary. Decreases in compensation are being accepted by many of our State, county, and municipal employees, and it seems to me that it would be the height of folly for postal employees in these same communities to insist on increases, directly or indirectly. You who are so opposed to reducing salaries of Government employees should hail with delight any legislation that looks toward maintaining a status quo salary position for those Government employees in whom you are so apparently interested.

Adopt this LaGuardia amendment, authorizing increases in salaries, and you will bring down upon you the wrath of the taxpayers to such an extent that legislation will be brought forth and enacted doing the very things you hope to prevent.

It is preposterous to talk about economy and then vote to increase salaries, even though the law does stipulate increases at certain times in one's service. We know something about a moratorium on debts, and it is high time that we declare a moratorium on increasing expenses. Our Ways and Means Committee is working long hours to find the money to balance the Budget, yet if this LaGuardia amendment is adopted it will cost the taxpayers several million dollars a year which go as increased salaries. The people will not and should not tolerate it.

The Post Office Department has in effect been doing the very thing which this appropriation bill authorizes, so far as these increases and promotions are concerned, and that work of economy in the department should be continued. Is not that right, I ask the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. BYRNS. That is true.

Mr. MICHENER. The real situation is that the department has run up against a decision by the Comptroller General which prevents the carrying out of economy, and it is the purpose of this bill, as presented by the Committee on Appropriations, to do what is intended to be done, and not what the Comptroller General thinks should be done. Everybody here is for economy until that economy begins to affect some interest in his district, and all are willing to vote for economy until they feel that some group back home might be offended by such action. This is an unpleasant year to be in Congress, but it is only by courageous votes that economy and expenses of Government can be effected.

This provision has been placed in preceding appropriation bills by the House, and, regardless of action at the other end of the Capitol, we should follow our charted economic course. I ask that those who voted for this amendment in the committee reconsider. It you want to help the postal employees, surely the best way to do that thing is to help them retain that which they already have. This is a case where you should consider both those whom you are trying to aid and the taxpayers who must furnish the money, because, as I stated above, a vote for this amendment means an increase of at least $7,000,000 which must be raised for the next fiscal year. The committee has given most careful consideration to this matter. The amendment has been thoroughly debated, and if there was ever a time that the people insist upon their Representatives in this body cooperating with the President and with the Committee on Appropriations in reducing the costs of Government it is now. I hope that the amendment will be defeated.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the amendments, with the recommendations that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOWARD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 9699, the Treasury and Post Office Departments appropriation bill, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded upon any amendment?

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a separate vote upon the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] striking out of the bill section 4.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment?

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I offered a perfecting amendment to the language of section 4 of the bill, as recommended by the committee. That amendment applied to only two or three lines of the bill. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] offered an amendment striking out the entire section. If we vote against the amendment will we have an opportunity to have inserted in the bill the perfecting amendment that I offered yesterday?

The SPEAKER. The House has no knowledge of the gentleman's amendment. The House has knowledge only of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I most respectfully ask the Speaker to answer my inquiry. Would the amendment that I offered perfecting the language of the bill remain in the bill?

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I do not profess to be an expert parliamentarian, but my understanding is that if the House should vote down the amendment of the gentleman from New York it will restore the section to the bill as it was reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. That is a correct statement of the parliamentary situation. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en bloc. The question is on agreeing to the other amendments.

The other amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Page 64, line 23, strike out all of section 4.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LAGUARDIA) there were—ayes 90, noes 102.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 160, nays 155, not voting 116, as follows:

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, having just entered the Chamber, I fear that I can not qualify. I did not realize that the House was convening an hour earlier than usual, so I was attending to official business at one of the departments and, consequently, was not present when my name was called.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut does not qualify.

Mr. TILSON. I am sorry, for I should like to support the committee.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, when the name of Mr. ALDRICH was called I inadvertently voted "aye."

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] present? If not, the RECORD will be corrected to eliminate his vote, if there is no objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that before the vote of Mr. ALDRICH is stricken from the roll call it should be determined whether or not he was actually in the House and voted at the time his name was called.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN] announced that he answered in response to the name of the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH]. The call shows that the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] is not present.

Mr. BRITTEN. But the gentleman might have been in the House and voted and not be present now.

The SPEAKER. That may be, but the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN] said that he responded to the gentleman's name and voted "aye." The record shows that he is recorded as voting "aye."

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, in order to settle the matter, I hold in my hand an announcement which I am requested to make in which the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] is paired, so that he was not present. He is attending a session of the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. That confirms the matter.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I doubt if I can qualify. If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "no."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not qualify.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I have been requested to ask that the following pairs be announced on the amendment.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the following pairs will be announced on the amendment.

There was no objection.

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

Mr. Rainey with Mr. Treadway.
Mr. Lewis with Mr. Watson.
Mr. Crisp with Mr. Bacharach.
Mr. Sanders of Texas with Mr. Crowther.
Mr. Eslick with Mr. Hawley.
Mr. Vinson of Kentucky with Mr. Chindblom.
Mr. Doughton with Mr. Aldrich.
Mr. Hadley with Mr. Dickinson.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the final passage of the bill.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi is opposed to the bill?

Mr. COLLINS. I am.

The SPEAKER. And the gentleman is a member of the committee?

Mr. COLLINS. I am.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi offers a motion to recommit, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. COLLINS moves to recommit the bill H. R. 9699 to the Committee on Appropriations, with instructions to report the same back forthwith with the following amendment: On page 31, line 11, strike out "$300,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$800,000."

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to recommit.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

The motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion by Mr. BYRNS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10022) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes; and pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent that general debate continue through the day, the time be equally divided and controlled by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. WASON] and myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10022, the independent offices appropriation bill, with Mr. SWANK in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, as the prospects for the consideration of this bill under the 5-minute rule are very remote at the present time on account of the schedule of the House, it is not my purpose now to discuss the bill in detail.

Under the program for the next few days, as we understand it so far, on Monday there is to be the Consent Calendar, on Tuesday the anti-injunction bill, and on Wednesday Calendar Wednesday business. Therefore it does not appear likely that we will get to the real consideration of this bill until the latter part of next week, with the additional contingency that if the tax bill comes in that will necessitate a still further postponement of the further consideration of this measure. So, for that reason I am not going to take your time now to discuss the details of this bill, carrying appropriations for some thirty-odd governmental departments, and in which the committee that brings it to you has made reductions of more than $54,000,000.

I am going to take just a few minutes, however, to relieve my conscience as a member of the Appropriations Committee. It has been hurting me a little since yesterday. The morning papers announced the fact, which I had hardly realized, that the distinguished and able chairman of our Appropriations Committee, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], had been left here yesterday on the floor of the House single-handed to fight for the provisions of his bill, with no other member of the committee and no Member on the minority side, I think, adding his voice to that of the chairman in attempting to maintain the integrity of the economy program of the Appropriations Committee. I want to here and now record the fact that I was present and voted with my chairman, and I want, as a Member of this House and as the chairman of a subcommittee that is working under him, to compliment and commend him to this House and to the country for his splendid efforts. He is working side by side and hand in hand with the distinguished minority representative on the Appropriations Committee in trying to formulate and bring to the House of Representatives and to the country a program that will help to balance the Budget of this Nation, which to-day is the most important problem that faces the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. GIFFORD. I want to say to the gentleman that there was a goodly number of that committee present last Saturday afternoon.

Mr. WOODRUM. I am glad the gentleman makes that observation, because most of the members of the Appropriations Committee were present at that time. But the thing that hurt my conscience, I will say to the gentleman, was that we did not raise our voices in support of the chairman of the Appropriations Committee. Maybe it would not have helped any to have done so, and from what has happened here to-day apparently it would not have helped.

The people of America to-day are divided into two groups. One hundred and nineteen and a half millions of them are people who have felt the stinging hand of the tragic panic under which we are living. [Applause.] It is not confined to any one group of people. It is not confined to the God-forsaken-looking crowd of humanity we pass in the bread line on Pennsylvania Avenue when we come to the Capitol every morning; but every banker, every lawyer, every doctor, every professional and business man, every merchant, every druggist, and every grocer has felt the stinging hand of these strenuous times. Every citizen, every farmer, every clerk, every housewife has felt the stinging lash of this so-called depression.

Something has been said about the integrity of contract, that this Government, forsooth, has a contract with its employees which must be observed.

Ah, my friends, go with me down into my district and I will take you in front of the municipal building of one of my cities, or the courthouse of one of my counties, where the auctioneer is selling the humble dwelling of a laboring man or the farm of some poor unfortunate citizen. In the files of that auctioneer you will find a stack of notes, and that laboring man or that farmer made a solemn contract to pay that debt for that dwelling or farm, but he has no way of paying it because he has not the money.

Now, what is happening in this country to-day? As I say, business and professional men have felt the stinging hand of this depression; the laboring man and the farmer have felt it in your districts; the man who works in the shops; the man who works in the factories; and the man who works on the streets has felt it. He is out of employment; he is working part time and he has had to keep his children out of school, perhaps. Not only that, but every county officer, I dare say, in most of the districts represented in this House—every State, city, and county officer, in most cases—has had to yield, and most of them have done it with good grace in these times and accept some reduction in salary. In many counties of our districts the schools have had to curtail their school terms and reduce the salaries of their teachers.

Then what about this great army of 5,000,000 or 6,000,000 men and women who are walking the streets begging for work, begging for employment?

This is the group I show you, gentlemen, in this one hundred and nineteen and a half million American citizens. The other one-half million, who do not know there has been a depression unless they have read it in the newspapers, who have not missed drawing their check on the first day of every month, who have not missed getting their sick leave and their annual leave of absence every time it has been due, who have not lost one sleepless night tossing upon a restless pillow wondering where they would get the money to pay the rent and the grocery bill the rest of the month or how long their job would last—this latter group are you and I and the others who have their names on the Federal pay roll.

Now, that is the situation in the country to-day, gentlemen; and when the Appropriations Committee of this House, under the able leadership of our Speaker and the chairman of our Appropriations Committee, and with a splendid and fine spirit of patriotic cooperation from every member of the committee, regardless of politics, sought to bring in a program whereby we could effectuate every possible economy without material injury to the public service we had a right to expect the support of the membership of this House. We did not ask a single Government employee to give one red copper penny from his annual salary. We did not do that. All we asked was that they forego the right to ask for promotions and increases during these tragic times when their brothers and their neighbors and their fellow men were down in the ashes of degredation and despair.

My friends, I have been in this House nine years. When I first came here I served upon the Civil Service Committee of this House. There have been days and years when I was counted as a friend of the Government employee. I have voted for many measures that carried increases in their salaries and carried benefits and prerogatives to which I thought they were entitled. I do not feel unkindly to them now, and the best I can say is that I do not believe the action that has been taken in this House reflects the sentiments of the vast army of men and women on the Federal pay roll. This is the most charitable thing that can be said. I do not believe it reflects their sentiments.

Now, something was said here yesterday about the psychological effect on these employees in withholding the right of promotion and salary increases. Well, I am not a psychologist, but I am going to venture an observation on the psychological effect of what we have done here to-day. I venture to say that there is no power under high heaven that will be able to stem the tide of popular demand for a radical and a drastic salary reduction in the pay roll of this Government.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself five additional minutes.

I have been among those Members of the House who have been hoping that by effecting savings and economies in appropriations and expenditures we could avoid taking a step of this kind. I am going to be frank enough to say that I had a personal motive, probably, that to some extent actuated my conclusion; but, on the other hand, I felt and I feel now that when the day comes that Uncle Sam has got to take down his flag of optimism and admit that he has got to curtail his pay roll, that then the last vestige of hope we can have that industry and private business will uphold the standards and maintain the present level of pay and living conditions will be gone and there will be a widespread and sweeping reduction of salaries. It has got to come, and, as one Member of the House, I am willing to say this now: If the attitude of the Federal employee is, as has been reflected here to-day, that he is not willing to forego his right of promotion and advancement during these perilous times, then, gentlemen, I am ready, as one Member of Congress, to vote on your salary cut bill, and the sharper you make the knife and the higher you begin to cut and the deeper you go, the better it will please me. If it has got to come to that, let it come, if that is the only way to reach it.

My friends who engineered this piece of legislation may feel they have done a very smart and intelligent thing that will benefit the workingman and the laboring man and the voting Federal employees, but I venture to say they have built a veritable Frankenstein and that before this thing is over it is going to start an avalanche of public indignation that this House will be unable to stand up against.

The bill that is now before you contains the same provision that the House of Representatives has repudiated in the bill just passed. It is going to be for you gentlemen, when the time comes, to pass upon it. I am going to discharge my duty to you and to my constituents by doing everything I can to maintain that provision.

Mr. ARENTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. I think it is about time that the gentleman from Virginia addressed his remarks not only to the majority leader but to the minority leader, because, after all, there must be some leadership, and if you are going to let the chairman of the Appropriations Committee stand here alone and fight his own battles, how far are you going to get? You have got to have a program and you have got to have leadership and you have got to follow such leadership. There has been no leadership and no program to speak of in this matter at all.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I will yield to the gentleman in a moment.

I quite agree with the gentleman from Nevada, but I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the obvious leadership on this question was the report of your committee that studied this bill and reported it to the House unanimously; and not only that, but the fact that two or three other bills containing similar provisions had passed the House of Representatives.

I now yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Can the gentleman explain why it is that on such a crucial vote as this we find JOHN TILSON, the great Republican leader; BERT SNELL, the great Republican leader; WILL WOOD, the great Republican leader—none of them voting to save this money—not one?

Mr. ARENTZ. Where are RAINEY and CRISP and the rest of your men?

Mr. BLANTON. They were hard at work on the tax bill in the Ways and Means Committee. Where were the three great horsemen of the Republican Party? Let the gentleman from Nevada, who voted against the committee's economy program, answer for his three leaders.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I want to say, if the gentleman will yield, in justice to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], he was heartily in favor of this provision. He joined in the report of the subcommittee and the report of the general committee in its advocacy. The gentleman is unfortunately out of the city, so I am informed, but if he had been here he would have voted against the amendment. There is no question about where the gentleman from Indiana stood. [Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself two more minutes.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that my name has been brought into the discussion as one of the responsible leaders, who should be leading the Republican hosts here, I wish to say, in the first place, that I am not clothed with this responsibility. No one can say that I ever shirked a responsibility placed upon me. In the next place, I had already stated when I entered the Chamber that I did not realize the House was meeting to-day at 11 o'clock instead of 12 o'clock and so was down at the departments on some business for my constituents and came into the Chamber just after the roll call was completed.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman from Virginia will permit, the gentleman from Connecticut is still a leader, despite what the Republicans did to him. [Applause.]

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] is absent. Mr. SNELL conferred with the leadership of the House last evening, and is out of the city, I understand, having, as the gentleman from Tennessee knows, the thought that to-day would be devoted to general debate. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] were present, he would support the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], and it was so stated on the floor.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. If I have any time.

Mr. LINTHICUM. It was stated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] that the provisions of which you speak have been stricken out of the bill as it was passed by the Senate.

Mr. WOODRUM. That is correct; they were stricken out because of a suggestion that in drawing the bill, certain personnel had not been considered by the committee. The Senate struck them out with the understanding that they would be taken up in conference in order that they might redraft them and take care of some technicalities. [Applause.]

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD].

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I, for one, felt that I was placed in a rather difficult position in voting as I did a few minutes ago and possibly we may anticipate recriminations for some time. However, I can not let the opportunity pass for referring to what happened last Saturday afternoon, at which time little was said by the members of the Appropriations Committee then present against the appropriation of the sum of $132,000,000 for roads, which many regard as likely to be built largely by machines rather than unemployed labor. That seems to have been a party measure, rushed through Congress, and it rather discouraged some of us in our attitude toward measures of economy. [Applause.]

We may expect differences of opinion on the subject of taking away from Government employees something of what seems to be due them under what amounts to a contract calling for automatic increases.

That may not be the correct view of the relation, but many of us so regard it. I have personally felt that it would be taking from them something to which they had a contractual right, and I regret that I could not support the chairman of the committee. I watched him last Saturday, every minute expecting to hear something from him, but did not.

I have great appreciation for the chairman of the subcommittee, but can not agree with his statement that the people who are on the Federal pay roll do not know that there is a depression.

I wonder if he does not continually receive calls for contributions to aid others more than ever in the past. He must make such contributions from his salary. If he is a business man he must also realize that bankers now find it necessary to make increasing demands for payment of obligations and that these must be met. All suffer from present conditions in one way or another, and it is hardly fair to state that those who draw Federal salaries do not know that there is a depression. Because of that fact, their obligations to the public are greater and a reduction would make it more difficult to meet such obligations. [Applause.]

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I have no alibi to offer to the House or to the country for my position in favor of economy. I am not seeking to justify a vote in favor of extravagance by claiming that the House, perchance, last week passed a bill that might be construed as out of harmony with an economical program. It was stated authoritatively upon this floor by the Republican leader, the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], that if that bill, for what I regard as an extravagant highway-construction program, passed the House and became a law, it would, within five minutes after that happened, in all probability meet with an Executive veto. That was his statement. Monday's papers confirmed that statement as to the President's position. I have no reason to believe that that will not be the position of the President in his determination to balance the Budget.

I compliment the Democrats for their good politics this morning in voting consistently in large numbers to back their chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in a policy that was inaugurated two years ago when the Republicans had control of the House. We started on this policy when the depression was on two years ago, not to provide for automatic increases of salary, so far as the field service was concerned. We suffered a temporary reverse at first in the House, but later the policy was adopted by both Houses.

It is all well and good for the leader of the progressive minority bloc, the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], to seek in every way to prevent any cut in appropriations or in salary increases. I justify my vote of "no" this morning, and I was ready yesterday to lend my voice, if called upon, to register my protest against discontinuing that policy of economy, in face of a political cabal, that seeks to tell us here how we should determine the policy of the Government as to cutting down expenditures lest perhaps we incur their ill will at the election.

I say to you Republicans from New York City, from New York State, from Massachusetts, from the heavy taxpaying part of the country, that you are not in a happy position, if you favor economy; to say because, forsooth, on Saturday last the Democrats favored an appropriation of $132,000,000 for road improvement, that, therefore, you are justified in departing from the economy program that is advocated by the President.

The President is sincerely desirous of keeping down appropriations. Are we, as Republicans, going to sustain him, or are we going to yield to the mandate of political organizations that seek to decapitate us unless we do their bidding? I come from a district which is held only by a scant political thread, but I shall vote consistently for what I believe is right in this hour of emergency. The people of the country, the farmers, the artisans, all classes, are in favor of cutting down mounting Government costs. My home city, socialistically controlled, is not voting for increase of salaries. The legislature of my State, controlled by so-called progressives, is not voting for increase of salaries. No; it is part of their program to cut down the salaries of the official salaried class.

And we, distant from the scene, apparently have not the stamina to stand up to-day and do our duty to the taxpayer of the country in this great emergency.

We have suffered a reverse, but I do not believe that we have suffered a rout. The end is not yet. The people will still rise in their might and call upon the Representatives who have deserted the flag and standard of economy to change their position so that we can have real economy, backing up the President, backing up all those who are sincerely desirous of balancing the Budget rather than piling up, Pelion high, taxes not alone upon the wealthy classes but upon the masses by means of a sales tax. [Applause.] So, for one, I am not misled by the passage through the House of a large good roads bill that can not be justified with consistent policies of economy.

I have said to my Federal employees that I will not favor cutting down any Federal employees' salaries below $2,000, or possibly $2,500, and certainly will not favor discharging any from the service. The proponents of this salary increase claim that there is a legal contract that binds us to vote the increase. Is there any legal contract that we shall keep any man on the Government pay roll? Have we adopted the socialistic principle that we owe every person in this country a living? It is within our province at any time to cut down appropriations. There is not a postal employee, there is not a Government employee, after we have pared the appropriations, that has yet been deprived of his existing salary.

Let us be frank. This is merely a surrender to a little cabal because some Members consider their seats prior to the interest of the Treasury. [Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise for the purpose of discussing what the House has just done. I have said enough upon that, perhaps too much. I do want to say to my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD] who took occasion to criticize me that he is not going to be able to satisfactorily explain to his constituents back home why he voted here this morning to levy a tax amounting to several million dollars upon his constituents by an increase of salaries for 1933. It does not matter what my position has been on any proposition, that is not going to be an explanation to the gentleman's constituents when he comes to face them in the election in November, because that is exactly what every man who voted yea did when he voted for that proposition. I have voted consistently for every economy program. The gentleman from Massachusetts voted with loud voice $500,000,000 for the banking interests of the country; but when it came to voting $132,000,000 to relieve unemployment and to build roads, he voted no. And last Wednesday, when it came to a vote on a proposition of saddling half a million dollars for this first year and more than that each year thereafter upon this Government by putting into commission 261 cadets at the Naval Academy, who the department heads say are not needed, the gentleman from Massachusetts is also on record as voting for it. If he can take those three votes back to his constituents and get away with it, it is all right with me. But I repeat that no man will be able to explain any vote he casts upon this or any other question by criticizing some of his colleagues.

Now, that is not what I rose to speak about. This is the sixth appropriation bill that has been reported by the Committee on Appropriations. The Committee on Appropriations has been sitting day and night. I want to pay tribute to every member of that committee, because I want to say to you and I want to say to the country that that committee has had only one object in view, and that is to try to reduce appropriations and save money to the taxpayers where they can do it without in any way affecting the functions of our Government.

Day and night for three months your committee has been sitting in hearings. Because forsooth some of us are not here when some vote is taken, when we are in the committee room at work, we are to be criticized. We bring these bills before you. It is your privilege, of course, to do as you please. We have discharged our responsibility when we make the recommendation. I can say for every member of the Committee on Appropriations, on both sides of the chamber, that in my judgment they have kept the faith, not only with the House but with the taxpayers of this country, in their effort to hold down appropriations and to help balance the Budget.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I want to congratulate the chairman of the committee and the committee upon the splendid reductions they have been making in this and other bills. I would like to inquire whether or not the chairman of the committee would not set out in his remarks the first two paragraphs of the report, which state eloquently in figures the splendid work of reduction?

Mr. BYRNS. That will be done by the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. WOODRUM, chairman of the subcommittee, who is in charge of this bill, when he comes to make his speech upon it.

I rose only for the purpose of calling the attention of the House and the country to the facts and to put in the RECORD just what the Committee on Appropriations has done with respect to bills that have been reported up to this time. There have been five bills reported, including the deficiency appropriation bill, namely, the Agriculture Department bill, the Department of the Interior bill, and the bill making appropriations for the State, Justice, Commerce, and Labor Departments, the bill for the Department of the Treasury, and the Post Office, which was just passed, and the independent offices bill which is now pending. The total reduction in all these bills below the President's estimate or Budget amounts to $114,579,052.56.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Is that below the appropriations of last year?

Mr. BYRNS. That is below the appropriations for last year. The total reductions under the appropriations for 1932, exclusive of the first deficiency bill, amount to $458,496,764.41. It is that much less than was carried for last year in these four regular annual bills.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman put in the RECORD how much of that $114,000,000 reduction is not really a reduction but a postponement until the deficiency appropriation bill in December? For example, with reference to the Veterans' Bureau, $50,000,000 has been cut out of that appropriation, and yet on reading the hearings it appears that that $50,000,000 is a reduction in the estimate of the amount of money that will be loaned to veterans, and the gentleman's committee has promised to put that in a deficiency bill if necessary.

Mr. BYRNS. There has been no promise to put it in a deficiency bill. Of course, a deficiency bill will carry whatever is needed. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] can correct me if I am wrong, but my understanding is that the Director of the Veterans' Bureau stated that he thought he could get along with the amount recommended.

Mr. WOODRUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUM. He said that his best judgment was that he would not need that amount.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. HOPKINS. It is not a reduction in appropriations. It is a postponement of estimated loans to veterans. There were $75,000,000 appropriated—

Mr. WOODRUM. The money is still in the Treasury and as long as it is there, it is not appropriated or allocated. It is in the pockets of Uncle Sam.

Mr. HOPKINS. But if the veterans continue to borrow as they have borrowed during last year, they will need the $50,000,000 in the December deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. WOODRUM. Not according to General Hines's statement. He said he did not think, based on present experience, they would need that.

Mr. HOPKINS. He said he hoped they would borrow from banks, and that they would not need it.

Mr. BYRNS. But the facts are that General Hines told the committee that in his opinion they would not need that $50,000,000, and the committee very properly decided, in view of the fact that the director general of the activity having that in charge said he did not think it was necessary, not to make the appropriation.

Mr. HOPKINS. I just wondered if there were any other decreases like that that were really postponements.

Mr. BYRNS. Not at all, except one, and that is the case of tax refunds which I explained to the House the other day, and that was the action of the Bureau of the Budget and not the action of the Committee on Appropriations. We did exactly what the Bureau of the Budget said.

Mr. HOPKINS. But if the veterans do borrow as they have in the past, the $50,000,000 will be required in December?

Mr. BYRNS. Oh, if the veterans borrow, yes; but the director general, I have been trying to show, stated that he did not believe they would, and that he did not think it would be required. Of course, if it is required, a deficiency will be forthcoming, because there is no intention to deprive veterans of whatever is due them.

Mr. WOODRUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUM. I call the gentleman's attention to the statement made by General Hines on page 542 of the hearings. He was very emphatic and unequivocal. There can be no possible room for any conjecture about it.

The potential borrowing capacity of the veterans is $1,750,000,000; but based upon experience and the present applications for loans as they are coming in, it was the deliberate, studied judgment of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs that $100,000,000 would be sufficient to run them through the present fiscal year, and certainly until the next session of Congress, and upon that assurance that amount was taken out of the bill.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman three additional minutes.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Has the gentleman any estimate of the savings that will be made if section 4, which was stricken out of the Treasury and Post Office bill, should be carried in other appropriation bills?

Mr. BYRNS. I will say that section 4, which was stricken out this morning, according to the estimate of the Postmaster General, as will appear in the hearings, would have saved $1,250,000, at least with respect to these two departments. Then when you take into consideration the other departments where there are automatic increases, such as in the Department of Commerce, the Department of State, the Department of Labor, the War Department, and the Navy Department, it would mean a saving of millions of dollars. I can not tell the gentleman definitely just how much.

Now, gentlemen, I want to complete the statement I rose to make. I want to take this occasion to congratulate the gentleman from Virginia, the chairman of this subcommittee, and those who have served with him, the gentleman from New York [Mr. BOYLAN], the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS], the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WRIGHT], the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. WASON], and the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SUMMERS], for the splendid bill they have presented to you and the work they have accomplished. They have rendered a real service to the country. I understand the reduction about which the gentleman complains represents the unanimous report of that subcommittee, Democrats and Republicans, and it also is the unanimous report of the entire general committee. This bill reduces the estimates $54,948,535. The deficiency bill, which was the first bill to be passed, reduced the estimates $14,171,120. The Department of Agriculture bill, $10,834,591. The Interior Department bill, $6,258,920. The bill for the Departments of State, Justice, Commerce, and Labor, $5,568,144.56. The Treasury and Post Office Departments, $22,797,742, or a total, as I have said, of $114,579,052.56.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. That provision was stricken out of the Post Office and Treasury Departments bill this morning by the House. Over in the Senate it has been stricken out by the Senate?

Mr. BYRNS. No; it has not yet reached the Senate.

Mr. LINTHICUM. In a number of bills it has.

Mr. BYRNS. Without prejudice, and with the direct statement made to the Senate by the chairman of the committee that it was stricken out solely for the purpose of permitting the conferees to get together and work out the proposition.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Inasmuch as that is the situation with respect to all the bills, does not the gentleman think there will be some arrangement made between the conference committees as to this whole proposition?

Mr. BYRNS. That is what I tried to put over to the gentleman and to other gentlemen, but without success. As to this particular provision which you have stricken from the bill, how are you going to get it in the bill unless the Senate puts it in with reference to these two departments? I say that those gentlemen who voted aye have by their action, unless the Senate restores this section, absolutely killed the proposal of the Appropriations Committee with respect to increases of salaries in 1933. There is no room for argument about that. It is a clear and undisputed fact. There can not be any question about it.

It is not a pleasant task for the Appropriations Committee to reduce appropriations. I do not think I ever did anything as unpleasant in my life, and I am sure I speak for every member of the Committee on Appropriations. I do not like to do it. I would much prefer not to do it, but I have a duty to perform and I am seeking to perform that duty. Notwithstanding what the House may do I can pledge that committee to continue to do its duty with respect to the Treasury. [Applause.] We are going to bring these bills in, and then the responsibility rests with the House.

But I want to appeal to you. This matter is on my heart, because I see stretching before us an expense for government which is going to overwhelm the taxpayers of this country if something is not done to relieve the situation.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert these figures in the RECORD with reference to savings effected on the appropriations bills so far considered by the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The pending independent offices bill is the fifth of the great annual supply bills that have been reported to the House at this session. It is the sixth bill that has been considered, which includes, of course, the deficiency bill, which was taken up shortly after this Congress convened.

This bill, as reported to the House, carries a reduction below the Budget estimates of $54,948,535, or approximately a reduction of 5 per cent under the Budget estimates.

The other bills, beginning with the deficiency bill, as they passed the House carried reductions under the Budget estimates as follows:

The deficiency bill as passed by the House was $14,171,120 under the Budget estimates, or approximately a 10 per cent reduction under the estimates.

The Department of Agriculture appropriation bill carried a reduction under the Budget estimates of $10,834,591, or approximately 6 per cent under the Budget estimates.

The Interior Department appropriation bill carried a reduction under the estimates of $6,258,920, or an approximate decrease under the Budget estimates of 11 per cent.

The State, Justice, Commerce, and Labor Departments appropriation bill carried a reduction of $5,568,144.56, or a reduction of approximately 4 per cent under the Budget estimates.

The Treasury and Post Office appropriation bill carried a reduction below the Budget estimates of $22,797,742, which is divided, as between the two departments, in a reduction of $14,824,830 for the Treasury Department and $7,972,912 for the Post Office Department.

In other words, these six bills have decreased the Budget estimates in the total sum of $114,579,052.56.

There are five more appropriation bills to follow: The District of Columbia, the legislative bill, the War and Navy Departments, and the second deficiency bill. How much this reduction will be increased by these bills it is impossible to say at this time.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS].

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I am going to repeat, in part, what I have said one or two times already in this session of the Congress. I join with the distinguished chairman of my committee in everything he has said regarding the willingness and the need of this Congress to curb and curtail public expenditures and appropriations; but as a member of the Committee on Appropriations and as a member of one of the subcommittees that has already reported a bill to this House, I can not sit here and allow to go unchallenged the statement just made that the Committee on Appropriations has recommended to this Congress savings to the taxpayer of $114,000,000.

It is true that the total Budget figures submitted to the Congress by the President up to this date are probably $114,000,000 more than the Appropriations Committee has recommended to the House, but it does not follow from this that it means for one moment that there is to be a saving of $114,000,000 to the taxpayers of this country or to the Treasury of the United States. I do not have the figures, as I am speaking without advance notice, but at a later date these figures will be put in the RECORD and repeated here on the floor, but let me go back over the bills that have been reported to the Congress and passed by the House.

In the first deficiency bill, of the savings that they claim of some twelve or thirteen million dollars, ten millions was cut from the appropriations in that bill for Federal aid to public roads. Now, what is involved in that item of savings to the taxpayer? Not one penny, because the obligation of the United States to make those appropriations exists and the Committee on Appropriations has no power to curb or reduce that obligation.

Mr. BYRNS. Is the gentleman referring to the deficiency bill?

Mr. SIMMONS. I am referring to the deficiency bill.

Mr. BYRNS. What will the gentleman say when I tell him that in a conference with the Director of Public Roads, he told me that the cut could be made and that he could not use the full amount between now and July 1?

Mr. SIMMONS. July 1, 1932; I know that. The gentleman has stated that many times, but that is not what I am talking about.

Mr. BYRNS. Does the gentleman want us to appropriate the money when he can not use it?

Mr. SIMMONS. I refuse to yield, Mr. Chairman.

What I am saying is that the obligation of the United States to pay that $10,000,000 that was cut out of the deficiency appropriation bill exists now and will continue to exist. My recollection is that the report of the committee on the first deficiency bill said that the $50,000,000, and not the $60,000,000, was all that was necessary until the regular supply bill came along. So there is an item of $10,000,000 that they claim as a saving that does not save one penny, finally, to the Treasury nor the taxpayer. It is merely the postponement of meeting an obligation.

Then in the Department of Agriculture appropriation bill $9,000,000 more was taken out of the item for public roads, or out of this $114,000,000 you have $19,000,000 that has been cut out of the Budget request for public-roads funds; but the obligation of the Treasury and of the United States to pay that $19,000,000 still exists. If we did not appropriate but half of it, they could still say they could have made savings of $50,000,000 instead of $19,000,000, but the Treasury would still have been obligated to meet the demands of the States for that money when the demands came in. There is no saving of taxes and no reduction of expenditures in such a procedure.

So I charge that a claim of a saving of that kind has only one effect, and that is to mislead the country into believing that savings are being made when actually nothing is being effected, save the creation of an impression of savings where none exists.

Then they came along with the Interior Department appropriation bill, where they cut some $6,000,000 out of it. And how? One million dollars of it was taken from the appropriation for the building of roads in the national parks, and immediately after that bill passed the House, here last week, the Congress, under the leadership of the Democratic organization of the House, passed a bill that requires the President to submit a Budget estimate asking for $1,500,000 for park roads. You have taken $1,000,000 out of the appropriation bill for national-park roads, claimed a saving to the country of that amount, and then you are asking in a legislative bill for the President to submit an estimate for $1,500,000 to take its place. There is no saving in that. After cutting $19,000,000 out of the appropriations for public roads and boasting to the country of it, the Democratic leadership put through this House last week a bill calling for the expenditure of $120,000,000 additional for public roads. The chairman of my committee [Mr. BYRNS] did not vote on that proposal. And we ought not to be dishonest as to the effect of the things that we do and say here in the House.

Now, what are the rest of the savings in the Interior bill? One million and a quarter dollars more, roughly—I have not the exact figures—was money that was taken out of reclamation projects in the Western States, where the Government is committed to its program, an expenditure that, incidentally, does not come out of the Treasury but out of a special fund; and if all the reclamation funds were stopped to-day the taxpayer would not be relieved of one penny, for he contributes not to that fund. But, without regard to that fact, those postponements of expenditures from a special fund are released to the press as a saving of taxpayer's money. No such a saving is accomplished.

Then we come along to the Post Office bill, where again they claim a saving of some $22,000,000. Well, one item of it is an item claiming a saving of $12,000,000—how? By the postponement of an appropriation for public buildings; not a saving to anybody, but $12,000,000 out of the $22,000,000 in that bill was merely the postponement of an obligation upon the Treasury and not a saving.

Now we come to this bill where, again, with a great showing of savings to the country, my committee claims it is saving $55,000,000 under the estimates of the President. And how? Well, here is one item of $500,000 cut out of the appropriation for the building for the Supreme Court in this city—merely a postponement of an expenditure and not a saving of one penny to the taxpayer.

Then they cut $50,000,000 out of the Budget request for money with which to pay the loans that the World War men may ask for on their adjusted-service certificates. How absurd it is to say that that is a saving to the taxpayer. The obligation of the United States to loan that money to these men is fixed. If we do not appropriate the money, the Government must find some way to meet its obligations. Why go to the country and claim that you are saving money merely by telling the Secretary of the Treasury that Congress is not going to give him the funds with which to meet all obligations to the World War veterans which have been fixed by Congress.

When Congress authorized the loan in the last Congress, it fixed the obligation of the United States. The cutting off of $50,000,000 does not stop or change the obligation one iota. It does not save the taxpayer one cent. It may delay the United States in making the loans; it may work an unjust hardship on some World War veterans. Nothing else will be accomplished.

It is said that General Hines said he could get along without this money. I say to you now that in the short session of Congress next fall we will have the biggest deficiency appropriation bill that we ever had in history in peace times if this policy gets through. All of these sums cut out of the appropriations will have to be picked up in the fall, in whole or in part, and the taxpayers will have to foot the bill. Of course, that will not come until after the next election. In my judgment if it were not for the oncoming election a number of these paper reductions would not be made.

Of course, they can get along until next fall. We could cut out the appropriations for salaries one-half, and they could pick it up in the deficiency bill next fall. Why not be honest in the effect of the thing that we are doing?

Now, what did General Hines say about the $50,000,000 that is cut out? On page 542 of the hearings he says:

> The estimate of $150,000,000 for 1933 contemplates normal death losses of $20,000,000 and loans of $130,000,000, the loans being equal to only 30 per cent of the total remaining loan value. These loans may not reach this point if conditions improve, and if conditions do not improve they may easily exceed it. The banks may not demand complete redemption for loans made by them, but from present indications it is apparent that they will. Under any circumstances, however, if this appropriation were reduced to $100,000,000, I think we would have sufficient funds to operate until—

The next fiscal year? Not at all. General Hines says:

> To operate until the next session of Congress, when the facts could be again presented and a special appropriation requested if necessary.

General Hines did not say that in his judgment the $100,000,000 was going to meet the needs through the fiscal year.

Now, let us see. On page 543 of the hearings the gentleman who is now presiding over the Committee of the Whole, Mr. HASTINGS, said this:

> You think the $100,000,000 is entirely adequate until Congress meets next December?

Get that—"next December."

General Hines said:

> I feel, as I have stated, the chances are it will meet the demand. If conditions should improve, we would have ample money, but most certainly we should, with $100,000,000 plus the balance, have sufficient to carry us until you gentlemen are back here again, and we can appeal if we need the money.

Now, let us see what the committee thought about this. On page 15 of the committee's report they say:

> Of the committee reduction, $50,000,000 is taken from the estimate of $150,000,000 for the adjusted-service certificate fund upon the assurance of General Hines that an appropriation of $100,000,000 will take care of the obligations until the next session of Congress, when a deficiency appropriation can be made if needed.

Get that—"until the next session of Congress." That means next December; that means after the elections; that means a deficiency appropriation.

Then again at the end of the paragraph they make the statement:

> With the possibility that the $100,000,000 carried in the bill will meet all requirements for the year.

Only a "possibility."

Let me repeat. In the savings in these bills, where in a very few instances the committee has reduced the Federal employees, the committee is entitled to claim savings to the country. In those instances where, as in the agricultural bill, we cut 5 per cent from the contingent fund for expenses, that will be a saving and will stay in the Treasury and help balance the Budget. But as for these savings running into millions of dollars, in each instance where the committee has done nothing but postpone an obligation that the Treasury knows and the committee knows must be met in whole or in part in deficiency appropriations next December, there is no actual saving, and we ought not to claim those savings to the country. When the whole story is told, the record of all that the House Committee on Appropriations has done will show that the vast majority of the claimed savings which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] just referred to and which he released to the press yesterday are savings that will not be reflected in the Treasury balance, that will not be reflected in reduced obligations on the Treasury, that will not be reflected in reduced tax bills from the taxpayer's standpoint, but are merely paper savings, that will be reflected only in Democratic campaign speeches between now and next November. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH].

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. Chairman, the discussions this afternoon have been somewhat discouraging to the line of thought I have in mind to present to the House. Perhaps nothing that I may say will in any manner change the action of this Congress nor the attitude of the individual Member, yet I feel that the citizenship which I represent has the right to know my attitude toward legislation that vitally concerns its interests.

A new Member reluctantly enters the field of argument. This is due to the consciousness that there are others whose views are predicated upon information which experience alone can gather and for that reason is more helpful to a correct solution.

There has been much criticism of the rule of seniority, long established and religiously adhered to by the membership of the Congress, while that rule to a more or less extent limits the activities of the new Members of the Congress, the thoughtful new Member would recognize the benefit of yielding to the experience of older Members if no such rule were in existence.

This Congress convened at the most serious peace-time period in the history of the world, at a time when there was upon us one of the worse panics that the industries of this Nation had ever known, a time when our financial structure was on the verge of collapse, a time when bank and business failures were the common experiences of every community, especially throughout the agricultural West and when agriculture was at the lowest ebb during its history.

The party which had successfully waged many campaigns on the representation that its policies were panic proof, the party which represented to the people that it was the only party which possessed the experience and political wisdom to direct the affairs of government during the reconstruction period, had failed to carry out its promises and lost its influence with the electorate. As a protest the control of the House of Representatives of our National Congress had passed from the administration in power to the Democratic Party.

When it was apparent that the control of the House had passed to the Democratic side, political strategists began to circulate the propaganda that the Democratic membership would not have the courage to assume responsibility.

The Democratic majority made answer to its critics by accepting responsibility and courageously taking leadership.

I am not overstating the feeling when I say that the leadership of the majority side of this House has given to the citizen a new hope, a new confidence, and has restored his faith in the stability of our Government.

The leadership of the majority of this House has risen above the spirit of partisanship and faced the conditions as it found them, has bended every energy and every talent in an attempt to correct the conditions that had stagnated the business of the country and had caused misery and want to dwell in a land blessed by the hand of God with plenty.

They have been subject to some partisan criticism, criticism that they did not take political advantage of the conditions, and by obstruction mete out political punishment to those in charge of the administration of the Government for the last decade.

No sooner had the Democratic leadership of this House thrown out the life line and saved the financial and business structure from complete collapse than partisanship began to assert itself on the minority side of the House, and the spokesmen for the administration began their well-known boast of what wonderful political wisdom the administration possessed and what a rare statesman the Executive had proven himself to be by temporarily rescuing business from utter destruction which their unwise administrative policies were rapidly bringing about.

There is much talk of balancing that Budget; it is elementary that it can be balanced only by two methods, one by an increase of revenues and the other by a decrease of expenditures. It is apparent, not only to the Member of Congress but to the citizen who has given the matter any considerable thought that even by paring all appropriations to the bone, so to speak, and by eliminating many of the bureaus and agencies that may not be necessary and useful in government, that the decrease in the estimates in revenue are such that somewhere from some source there must be derived a revenue to balance the necessary expenditures.

I venture the prediction that when that necessary tax is levied, which it must and will be, to make up for the deficiencies which these unprosperous conditions have brought about that those in charge of the administration of the Government will use every artifice known to politics to escape the blame. I suppose some skilled strategist will be employed to trace the root of this panic to the prosperity of the Wilson administration.

We were asked at the beginning of the session of this Congress to support emergency measures carrying appropriations of hundreds of millions of dollars for the relief of distressed banking institutions and depressed industries. These measures received almost unanimous support from both sides of the House.

That support was given upon the representation that these enormous appropriations were absolutely necessary to prevent a national catastrophe which would endanger the institution of government itself, that these appropriations would help to bring about the normal functioning of the various industries of this country and hasten the end of the present crisis.

There was no definite information given to the Congress as to what part of these stricken financial and business establishments these generous lotions would be applied. We were told that detailed information upon this would be dangerous to the welfare of the country and that a delay in extending the remedy would prove fatal.

The Congressman acting upon the assumption that the agency charged with the administration of these enormous trusts would administer them honestly, intelligently, and for the public good, in the face of criticism, gave his support to these measures.

The only observation that I care to make at the present time in reference to these relief appropriations is that if properly applied these enormous amounts of money made available to the banking and industrial institutions should be productive of much good, but that if improperly applied they will be productive of immeasurable harm. If they are simply to patch up some of the losses of the habitual violator of the rules of sound business, the public will receive no benefit.

It is very apparent that the money voted for this relief will be absolutely wasted if the agency that administers these relief measures will not furnish this Congress with information concerning the causes that brought about these unstable conditions, so that legislation can be enacted to prevent a further recurrence of the practices that brought about these serious ills.

There is a unanimity of sentiment among the substantial citizenship of this country for economy, for the elimination of waste and the checking of extravagance in the cost of government.

The air has been charged with courageous expressions from legislators of forced economy and the elimination of bureaus and unnecessary agencies with overlapping authority. The loudest of these expressions have come from the representatives of the party that has been in charge of the administration of this Government for the past 12 years, under whose administration bureaus have multiplied, agencies have increased, and under whose policies the Federal Government has injected itself into fields into which it was never intended by the framers of the Constitution it should extend.

Federal legislative enactments in the last decade authorizing encroachments of one department of government upon another and the Federal Government upon the rights of the States has brought uneasiness to the mind of the student of constitutional law.

It was somewhat disappointing to find that the Members on the administration side of this House who had charge of the making of the Budgets and appropriations and directing the affairs of government for the last 12 years, who were more loudly than sincerely demanding reduction in the cost of government, stood hopelessly divided upon the question as to what bureaus and agencies were necessary and what appropriations could be eliminated without impairing the proper functioning of its various departments.

During all this time the only hopeful sign was that the major committees of this House controlled by a Democratic membership with every appropriation that was reported made marked reductions in the amount of the appropriations from those that had been recommended in the Budget, most of which reductions were made in the face of the opposition of the minority of this House, representing the administration in power.

It was not, however, until House Resolution 151, providing for the appointment of the Economy Committee, was acted upon and that committee appointed for the purpose of investigating the economies of the Federal Government which may be effected without impairing the necessary functions of the Government, that we had the assurance that an analysis of the business of the Government would be made and a real economy effected.

It is not, however, my purpose to impose my ideas on the economic conditions generally, but I do make bold to address myself to some of the conditions affecting my own constituency in the State that I represent.

The citizenship of the State of Illinois, rural and urban, is very much concerned with the policies and problems pertaining to banking and agriculture.

It is seriously interested in the causes that have affected in a most disastrous manner the basic industry of the Central West, destroyed the credit of the farmer and business man and closed the doors of thousands of our banking institutions. Upon these two propositions I ask your indulgence for a brief time.

In order that I might intelligently convey my ideas it will be necessary for me to review briefly the conditions and the policies pursued in the recent past.

The criticisms that I desire to make are what I consider constructive criticisms and not merely criticisms for political effect.

If there is any one particular tendency among the senior Members on the other side of the aisle by which I have felt grieved, it has been the willingness to criticize and justify error and the unwillingness to admit their mistakes, even though these mistakes were so apparent that they could be seen by the purblind.

A proper diagnosis of any ailment is absolutely necessary for the proper treatment, and the proper treatment of a political ill can only be remedied when the erroneous policy is discovered and corrected.

While agriculture and banking in the States of the South and West are necessarily very closely related to each other, so that an abnormal condition in one reflects itself in the other, yet the depression in agriculture, while it was one of the contributing causes, was not alone responsible for these enormous bank failures in the agricultural sections.

That this is true we need only cite that thousands of urban banks, not in any way dependent upon agriculture, have closed their doors.

On the other hand, while the policies adopted by the banks contributed to the depressed condition existing in agriculture, banking conditions were not the cause of the lack of prosperity in this important industry.

It could not be expected that agriculture would prosper when the other industries of the country are in a state of panic. The products of agriculture can not find a ready market when the consumer has no money with which to buy.

This also makes it rather difficult to determine whether or not we have the overproduction that we are told exists of many of the agricultural commodities.

It must be remembered that agriculture was very much depressed long before the general depression seized us. Such depression was recognized by both the major parties in their platforms in 1924.

That there had been a discrimination against agriculture and that by lack of appropriate legislation it was not on an equality with other industries, was admitted in the platforms of both of the major parties in 1924 and 1928.

Inasmuch as a Republican administration supported by Republican Congress has been in power since 1920, it would be impossible to advance any criticism toward any of the policies pursued toward agriculture without that criticism being construed as more or less political, yet at the risk of being accused of being partisan, I venture to give my views and my criticisms in reference to the policies that have been pursued during the past 12 years under which, even with other business conditions being normal, agriculture could not have prospered.

From 1920 to 1924 there was a reluctance in the administration to recognize that agriculture was discriminated against and while the various organizations representing the agricultural industries were warning Congress of the perils that were threatening that great industry there was no change in policy and no legislation passed to correct any of the errors or give relief.

Much of the time of the Sixty-eighth Congress was taken up in passing what was commonly known as the first McNary-Haugen bill, S. 4808, which had to deal with the matter of disposing of surplus products and which involved the principle of the equalization fee concerning which there was much difference of opinion and controversy.

That bill was passed by the Congress but failed to receive the approval of Mr. Coolidge, the then President of the United States.

The President's veto message contained the following comment upon the conditions confronting agriculture:

> No one can deny that the prices of many farm products have been out of line with general price level for several years. No one could fail to want every proper step taken to assure to agriculture a just and secure place in our economic scheme. Reasonable and constructive legislation to that end would be thoroughly justified and would have the hearty support of all who have the interests of the Nation at heart.

The President bases his veto of the measure upon the following general criticism:

The difficulty with this particular measure is that it is not framed to aid farmers as a whole, and it is, furthermore, calculated to injure rather than promote the general public welfare.

Then follows a lengthy detail of criticism in amplification of the general statement.

The Sixty-ninth Congress when it convened passed a bill (S. 3555) to meet the objections of the President, but that bill was also vetoed by Mr. Coolidge.

The objections to this measure as set out in the measure are:

1. Its attempted price-fixing fallacy.
2. The tax characteristics of the equalization fee.
3. The widespread bureaucracy which it would set up.
4. Its encouragement to profiteering and wasteful distribution by middlemen.
5. Its stimulation of overproduction.
6. Its aid to our foreign agricultural competitors.

The President then contradicts his former statement as to the condition of agriculture; he includes in the veto message the following statement:

Nor should we overlook the fact that our farmers have made noteworthy progress since 1921, both in the purchasing power of their products and in the output per worker in agriculture. The latter is the result of improved methods and equipment, and is in keeping with the fundamental cause of American prosperity—high productivity per worker.

Mr. Coolidge then closes the door of hope for relief with the following statement:

Moreover, we should avoid the error of seeking in laws the cause of the ills of agriculture. This mistake leads away from a permanent solution, and serves only to make political issues out of fundamental economic problems that can not be solved by political action.

The President then clearly shows the attitude of his mind by indulging in the following prophecy:

Once we plunged into the futile sophistries of such a system of wholesale commercial doles for special groups of middlemen and distributors at the expense of farmers and other producers it is difficult to see what the end might be.

These veto messages caused the representatives of the Republican Party assembled in convention at Kansas City much worry. At that convention agriculture stood outside knocking for admission, but the now ambassador to the Court of St. James instructed his doorkeepers to lock the portals.

Ex-Governor Frank O. Lowden, of Illinois, one who perhaps was more interested in the agricultural problem than anyone before that convention, after he read the platform withdrew his name as a candidate, gathered up his following, and went home.

In order to offset this bad record and unfair treatment the promise was made that if Mr. Hoover would be elected to the Presidency of the United States one of his first official acts would be to call a special session of the Congress for the purpose of passing legislation for agricultural relief and revise the tariff on those commodities that affected agriculture.

The special session of Congress, which was convened pursuant to that promise, enacted legislation dealing with the tariff and agriculture which did more to destroy agricultural prosperity than the act of any Congress since the adoption of the Constitution.

Tariff schedules were adopted so outrageous that for the first time in history retaliatory laws were passed which practically closed the markets of the world against American-made goods, and especially the products of agriculture.

Five hundred million dollars were made available for loaning purposes under the guise of financing cooperative marketing agencies which were making headway in protecting the farmer from selling his produce on low markets.

The real purpose of the act was not revealed until its administration was undertaken when, instead of loaning to the various cooperatives, those in charge undertook the organization of a huge trust, not for the purpose of raising but for the purpose of stabilizing at a low price the products of agriculture.

Two Delaware corporations were organized with interlocking directorates and permitted to deal with each other in the buying and selling of grains, both financed by this fund.

The stock and storage facilities of privately owned grain companies were purchased at prices far above the actual value, and enormous salaries were paid by the purchasing corporation, all financed by loans from the revolving fund.

The Farmers National Grain Corporation made profitable deals selling grain to the stabilization corporation far above the market price, and the stabilization corporation bought and lost with money loaned it by the agency of the Federal Government.

In the meantime, the prices for farm products began to reach low levels. The farmer who was depressed during the Harding and Coolidge administrations became panic-stricken as the corporation financed by his Government became his competitor, offering their holding on the market against the farmers' incoming crop, and forced the price of grain below the cost of production.

Resolutions are pending in both House and Senate for an investigation of the transaction of those in charge of the administration of this act with the corporations created under it. These transactions were conducted at a loss of several hundred millions of dollars, and the public is entitled to know the facts.

Whether the law as passed is good or bad, the maladministration of it makes it impossible to judge.

At a time when the outlook for agriculture was most discouraging, when the farmer was experiencing his hardest struggle to meet the taxes and general obligations, the policies of the banks with which he had been dealing in the years past and to which he had always come for credit changed their attitude.

The funds were not only no longer available to carry on the transactions of the farm, but he was demanded to repay the capital loan.

The banker who he felt knows him better than any other man in the community and with whom by a long course of honest dealings he felt he had established for himself a sure credit began to talk to him in strange terms.

He was told that his capital loan was regarded by the department as a frozen asset and that he must make some effort to meet the obligation when it became due. He must procure the money elsewhere. In some instances he was assisted by his banker in securing a loan from the Federal land bank or the joint-stock land bank, but in by far the majority of the instances he was unable to transfer his loan to these institutions.

Coerced by the policy of the department, he was forced to liquidate, and his farm was sold under the hammer, and the equipment and livestock were sold to pay the deficiencies. He was forced to sell at a time when there was no market for farm lands and when the stock and equipment brought but a small per cent of their normal value.

The same policies enforced against the farmer were pursued as to the urban home builder and local business man.

The banks throughout the Central West were told by the representatives of the department that they must become liquid in order to protect themselves against a run by the depositors.

Then began the campaign of educating the banker as to what was meant by the term "liquidity." The ordinary bank carried as its first reserve the cash in its vaults, the bonds of the Federal Government, and such other securities as could be readily converted into cash, the department insisted that they should build up a secondary reserve. It was this secondary reserve built up under the supervision and direction of the Department of the Federal Government that caused the downfall of the bank.

It was not generally known that the financiers of Wall Street had become interested as brokers in the sale of the industrial securities of the countries of Europe and South America, and the western banker was somewhat astonished when he was told of the high rating of these foreign securities and that his secondary reserve should be built up with these investments.

The bond salesmen and the examiner worked hand in hand, and it was not long until almost every bank had substantial investments in securities of this class bearing high ratings from the inspection departments and whose liquidity was vouched for by those in charge of the examination of the conditions of the institution.

Community building was no longer a part of the banks' problems. The matter of investing the surplus cash became easy and for a while was very profitable.

The returns in dividends on their bank stock and the further assurance that they were not only favored but recommended by the agents of the Federal department quieted the officer of the bank who might be skeptical.

Every examiner became a part of the great sales force to help market these securities; and before the Nation was aware of what was happening, between ten and fifteen thousand millions of dollars of these foreign industrial securities had been purchased by the banks and the investors of this country, and the original brokers had, at the expense of the ruination of the financial structure of this Nation, collected to themselves profits the amount of which will never be known, but it is safe to estimate that these profits ran into the billions.

When the market quotations on the secondary reserve began to drop and the bank was unable to dispose of these securities upon the market, except at a great loss, the banker realized what had happened.

Confronted by this condition the unscrupulous banker tried to do what had been done to him; that is, sell to innocent depositing customers. The scrupulous banker delivered up the keys or marked time.

It was then that the real failures began. Their doors were closed at a rate of from 10 to 15 banks per day in the last year. The institution that had always been considered the safest and most stable institution of this country became the most discredited.

The department of this Government in charge of the supervision of the banks is responsible for this condition.

It was a part of the great movement to centralize the money of this country in the international banking centers of the East, the accomplishment of which can only be made possible by the destruction of the community banks scattered throughout this Nation. It was the first step in the policy of substituting branch banking for community banking.

Branch banking has been recommended by Mr. Hoover in his message to every Congress since his election to the Presidency.

In order to make the branch bank possible in a community the community bank must be destroyed. The method of destruction adopted by the administration was heartless and cold-blooded.

Branch banking means the elimination of the country bank and substituted therefor a bank controlled by a central source deaf and indifferent to the community needs. [Applause.]

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN].

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, every government in recorded history which has ever failed, at the very moment of its failure the people were being bled white by taxation, at the very moment of its failure the government was making a frantic effort to tax itself into security. We can read the history of Greece, Rome, Spain, and France, and can eliminate the names of Greece, Rome, Spain, and France, and insert the name of the United States and make it current history. This Government to-day is bankrupt. It is bleeding the American citizens white for taxes.

The total income of the United States amounts to $65,000,000,000 a year, and in that I refer to the wages, the salaries, the profits, the dividends of all our citizens. The total public expense of Federal, State, and local governments amounts to $15,000,000,000. One dollar out of every four dollars and thirty-three cents which is earned by an American citizen, whether it be by the sweat of his brow or interest on capital investments, is wasted for taxation, for some public purpose which is nonproductive. The Government of the United States is going behind at the rate of $2,000,000,000 a year. Every day we sit in this House the Government of the United States spends $5,000,000 more than its income during that day, and there is no one in the United States who has the power to correct that situation except the Congress, and there is no one so much to blame for it as Congress. If we are going to have a constitutional government, a parliamentary government, this Congress must have the moral courage to meet the situation. We can not reduce these expenses unless men have the courage to sit in this body and reduce them. [Applause.] In time of war, when this country is in great distress, what the country needs is not men smart enough to profiteer and make a million dollars but men with the courage to die for their country; and in an hour like this what a parliamentary government needs, what the Government of the United States needs, is not Congressmen who are astute enough to be reelected but Congressmen with the patriotism and the moral courage to be defeated, if necessary, in an effort to balance the Budget. [Applause.] As I look over the past week of what has happened in this House I am fairly convinced that there is not a single question which means quite so little to the Members of the House as the fact that their Government is spending $5,000,000 every day more than its income.

In the light of the record of this House during the last seven days, I can not think of a single thing that this House takes more lightly than the fact that this Government is going behind at the rate of $2,000,000,000 a year. In the light of the conduct of this House during the last week, beginning one week ago to-day, I can not think of a single thing that is of so little importance to the House as the fact that the citizens of this country are being bled white by taxation. That is the issue which is before the people of this country. It is the crying need of the hour to reduce expenses, and about all it amounts to on the floor of this House is partisanship and bickering between the two parties. I have but praise for the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS]. I have but praise for my colleague from Kansas [Mr. AYRES]. I do not care that they are Democrats. They have been patriots and have tried to reduce the expenses of this Government. I have said that on account of the record of this House during the last week I have thought that the matter of balancing the Budget meant nothing to it; and I am going to tell you why I say that. Last Saturday we voted $132,000,000 for so-called highway improvements under the guise of unemployment. Of course, we exercised just the same statesmanship that Louis XVI practiced on the eve of the downfall of the Government of France under the Bourbons. He was trying to solve the economic and social ills by bleeding the producers of the country.

A few days later, on Wednesday, I think it was, we came here and, by our votes, arbitrarily placed some cadets on the pay roll for life who are not needed in the Navy. When we did it, we did violence to a law that Congress has heretofore enacted, based upon the scientific needs of the Navy, namely, that it should consist of 4 per cent officers and 96 per cent enlisted men. What was the excuse and argument for putting those men in the Navy as officers when we did not need them? One excuse was that they were young men, just going out into life, and these were hard times. Young unmarried men, who have just been educated at the expense of the Government and at a time when there are eight and one-half million men, mostly married men, out of employment and in distress, and we give as our reason for commissioning those men that it would be hard for them to get started in life. What about the thousands of young men who are going out from your State universities and mine, who did not go through that university at the expense of the taxpayers of the United States but who went through at the expense of their parents or their own toil? So much for that.

We come now to this last bill guaranteeing automatic increases in salaries to members of the Postal Department. I do not believe it is unfair or unkind to say that this Congress did not vote this morning to grant those increases on the basis of justice. This same House of Representatives, composed of the same Members, in five other bills voted not to give those automatic increases in salaries; and I say to you if it is justice to do it to the postal employees, it was justice to do it for the employees in the Department of Justice, in the Department of the Interior, and the Department of Agriculture.

The only excuse that can be given for the difference is that this was a political vote this morning. The only excuse that can be given is that there is not an Interior Department employee in every Congressman's district; that there are not Department of Agriculture employees in every Congressman's district; that there are not Department of Justice employees in every Congressman's district, while on the other hand there are postal employees in every Congressman's district. When the representatives of the postal employees sat in yonder gallery and cracked the lash, Congressmen here did the unequal thing of voting to do for the postal employees what they did not do for the employees of any other department of Government. The vote to-day proves that this is a political Congress, and that it is dealing with the great problem of balancing the Budget on the basis of votes at the fall election. Thank God there is more statesmanship in the people back home than the Members of this House think there is.

I want to read to you a straw vote taken by the Des Moines Register. When it held a straw vote on candidate for President, it held a straw vote on public questions——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman read all of the votes for our information?

Mr. McGUGIN. Well, my speech is not political. I can not gratify the gentleman's political desires.

One of the questions was reduction of public salaries. There were 47,218 in favor of reducing public salaries and 8,975 against it. Nearly 6 to 1 in favor of reducing public salaries. What do you think the vote would have been on the salary increases granted to-day by this House if that issue had been left to the people of Iowa to decide?

I am firm in my conviction that those who voted this morning thinking it was politically wise to vote that increase, made a mistake, and I hope they did make a mistake. I hope the people back home have the courage to meet it. If Congressmen are going to be lashed into their votes by the head of some organized minority bloc, then I hope the great unorganized masses will learn the truth and take the situation in their own hands.

A parliamentary government should not be run upon that basis, but if it must be run upon the basis of men sitting here in Congress and either being lashed by those who are going to live off the public pay roll or lashed by those who pay the taxes, then I hope those who pay the taxes will be the ones to wield the lash.

I am firm in my conviction that before this Congress is over, you will have to meet the issue and cut the public salaries of this country of ours, and they should be cut. Men out in private industry have taken their cuts. Eight and one-half million of them suffered a 100 per cent cut when they lost their jobs. Practically all of the others have taken reductions. Twenty-seven million farm people of this country are to-day operating on 40 per cent less income than they received before the war. Every commercial institution, corporation, or individual is operating with less income, and yet all of those institutions which are operating with less income, and all those people whose salaries have been reduced, are the ones who must pay the public salaries, which we now say must remain undiminished.

Oh, you say we are doing public employees an injustice by reducing their salaries. My answer is that it is impossible to refrain from reducing their salaries without doing an injustice to the great toiling masses of this country who must pay the taxes.

The Ways and Means Committee is about to bring in a new tax bill. It is trying to balance the Budget of this country. It is trying to save your country and my country from the ruin which is inevitable, if we do not balance the Budget. To do so, it has doubled the income tax, I am advised. I am not a member of that committee, but that is what I have been told. It has increased the estate taxes. Personally, I am opposed to a sales tax, but if that Ways and Means Committee comes in with a bill whereby it has taxed the great incomes of this country to the limit and whereby it has taxed the large estates in all reasonable bounds, and then there is still a deficit, I am ready to take the sales tax.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, I yield three additional minutes to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. McGUGIN. We should pay as we go. If we do not raise revenue to pay these debts, then we must issue bonds, and that means that we are passing our current expenses on to our children to pay. If we do this, then we are as devoid of moral character as the parent who is content to die leaving his grocery bill for his children to pay. A generation which is willing to pass its current governmental expenses on to its children disgraces alike its forbears and posterity.

When we turn to the sales tax, that means that every man, woman, and child is going to pay a tax practically every time he eats a meal and every time he places a stitch of clothing upon his back. When that bill comes before this House for consideration, I expect to hear those who have been the loudest in voting these appropriations to be the ones who will complain the most about levying a tax in order to meet the expenditures of the Government and help balance the Budget. I expect many to vote against that tax bill, yet in many instances those who vote against it will have been the ones who made it necessary when they voted for all kinds of appropriations.

I am going to vote for the tax bill if it comes anywhere near being within reason, and I am going to tell the people of Kansas, "Yes, I voted for the tax bill which is now a burden upon you, but I did not vote the taxes upon you. The taxes were not placed upon you when the tax bill was passed; they were placed upon you when appropriations were made—which I voted against. The ones who voted to put those taxes on your backs were the Members who voted, without rhyme or reason, for large appropriations. After they made those appropriations it was necessary to place a tax on the backs of the American people in order to meet those appropriations and to preserve the credit and integrity of the Government of the United States." [Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. STEWART].

Mr. STEWART. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I have listened with pleasure to the remarks made this afternoon in a desire to balance the Budget, and remarks to the effect that apparently some of the Members of this House in their votes have not expressed their own opinions but have been actuated by some other motive, political or otherwise.

I am going to discuss very briefly the relation of prohibition to our present economic difficulties.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to present for your earnest consideration the effect which prohibition has had upon the economic structure of the Federal Government, the several States and thousands of municipalities, throughout our country.

I am going to present facts from two great central States for two reasons. First, because here I found evidence that the Anti-Saloon League, in its official publication, the American Issue, made specific promises that prohibition would produce economic, moral, and social benefit, stressing particularly the economic benefits which would arise. Specific benefits were promised in reduction of taxes in one State alone by more than $3,000,000.

I have chosen these States for the second reason that they are not representative of what the professional drys call the "wet East," nor, on the other hand, the "bone-dry West." Situated midway between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, these States may be said to be fairly representative of the conservative-thinking people of the United States.

In the prohibition campaigns conducted by the Anti-Saloon League and allied professional prohibition organizations, extravagant claims were made of the benefits which would result from the ratification of the eighteenth amendment. The prohibition policy was going to eradicate crime to such an extent that prison costs would be reduced by 75 per cent; it was going to bring about a 25 per cent reduction in the cost of caring for the insane; it would reduce the cost of boys and girls' reformatories by 50 per cent; it would save 12½ per cent in the cost of epileptic hospitals; it would save 75 per cent of the total criminal costs of the State governments.

I have looked up some of these specific promises. My researches were rewarded by the discovery of a calculation made by the Missouri Anti-Saloon League in 1916 in which specific claims were made. It was stated in the American Issue, the official organ of the Missouri Anti-Saloon League, on November 9, 1916, that the cost of supporting the Missouri Penitentiary for the fiscal year 1913–14 was $954,181.15, of which 75 per cent, or $715,635.17, was due to liquor. The inference, of course, was that if prohibition should be adopted the cost of the penitentiary would be reduced from $954,181.15 to $228,545.40. I find upon further checking this calculation that the claim was made the expense of maintaining the three State insane asylums would be reduced by 25 per cent, resulting in a saving of $556,392.67; that the cost of running the boys' reform school would be reduced from $205,312.47 to $102,656.23, or 50 per cent; that the cost of maintaining the girls' reform school would be reduced from $161,161.02 to $80,580.51; that the total criminal costs of the State of Missouri would be reduced from $965,436.44 to $240,992.42, or 75 per cent; and that the cost of maintaining the paupers of the State would be reduced from $2,231,322.44 to $1,486,881.63, or 33⅓ per cent. The entire cost of liquor to the State of Missouri in the form of prison, asylum, pauper, and criminal expenses was assessed by the Anti-Saloon League of that State at $3,020,073.37. Is was stated that—

> These facts are enough to make every taxpayer in the State understand the greatest cause of taxation.

There is no question that if taxes in this one State, by reason of the enactment of the eighteenth amendment, would have been reduced by some $3,000,000 a year, it would have been a great economic benefit.

I have therefore examined the Binennial Report of the Department of Penal Institutions for Missouri for the fiscal year of 1927–28.

I find that the cost of running the Missouri Penitentiary in that year instead of being $228,545.40, as promised by the Anti-Saloon League, was $2,413,844.28, more than ten times what the advocates of prohibition promised it would be. The report of the department of penal institutions shows that in 1917–18 there were 2,317 prisoners in the Missouri Penitentiary, and that in 1927–28 there were 3,832. I find that on May 7, 1931, the population of the Missouri Penitentiary, as shown in a special dispatch to the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, was 4,338, almost a 90 per cent increase.

Instead of the cost of the reform school, or prison, for boys being decreased by 50 per cent, it was $446,541.81 in 1927–28 as compared with $205,312.47 in 1913–14. The cost of maintaining the girls' reform school at Chillicothe, Mo., instead of being decreased 50 per cent, as promised in 1916, rose from $161,161.02 in 1913–14 to $243,092.60 in 1927–28.

The voters of Missouri were given to understand by the Anti-Saloon League in 1916 that if prohibition were adopted, the cost of maintaining the State penitentiary and the boys' and girls' reform schools would be only $411,782.14. The actual cost of maintaining these three institutions, as shown by the official records of the State, was $3,103,498.69 for the fiscal year of 1927–28, and from the great increase of prisoners since that date it must be considerably higher now.

It is fair to take the promises made by the Missouri Anti-Saloon League as typical of the economic benefits of prohibition promised in other States by the same organization. I happen to have a press release issued August 29, 1930, by Mr. Rodney H. Brandon, director the Department of Public Welfare of the great State of Illinois. Bear in mind that in Missouri the Anti-Saloon League held out the promise to the people that the cost of their State correctional institutions would be reduced anywhere from 33⅓ to 75 per cent, upon the adoption of prohibition, and then listen to these extracts from the press release of the director of public welfare of the neighboring State of Illinois:

> During the decade which ended June 30, 1930, the population of Illinois charitable and penal institutions increased 50.85 per cent, Gov. Louis L. Emmerson was advised to-day by Rodney H. Brandon, director of the department of public welfare.
> In the same period, the population of the States as a whole increased only 17.65 per cent. The rate of increase in population of the institutions under the department of welfare was almost three times the rate of increase in the State's general population.
> During the 1920–1930 decade cited by Director Brandon, the increase in the State's penal population was 131.25 per cent, and was greater than the total increase for the 60 years previous to 1920.

So we find the promise by the Anti-Saloon League of empty prisons and abandoned institutions for the insane and otherwise helpless people met by the stubborn facts in one of the greatest States of the Union showing an actual increase during the first prohibition decade of 50.85 per cent, as applicable to all State institutions, and 131.25 per cent as applicable to the State prisons, an increase greater than during the past 60 years.

Let us now consider the economics of prohibition after 12 years. By reference to Table 33, page 47, of Statistics Concerning Intoxicating Liquors, issued in December, 1931, by the United States Bureau of Industrial Alcohol, you will find that in 1918 there were 56,222,477.3 gallons of whisky withdrawn from the bonded warehouses upon payment of taxes. In 1919 there were 62,142,459.6 gallons of whisky withdrawn.

It happens that in 1930 the Prohibition Director of the United States issued a monograph entitled "Possible Production of Illegal Liquors Made in the United States for the Year Ending June 30, 1930."

This survey was made for Director Woodcock by two employees in his department, one of whom was formerly employed by the Methodist Board of Prohibition, Temperance, and Public Morals. It is not likely that these gentlemen, with such pronounced prohibition tendencies, would exaggerate the quantity of liquor made unlawfully in the United States.

I am setting up in parallel columns the actual amount of alcoholic beverages withdrawn from bonded warehouses or manufactured for consumption in the United States in 1919 and Mr. Woodcock's estimates of the amount of the same beverages illegally manufactured in 1930:

	Gallons, 1919	Gallons, 1930
Whisky	62, 142, 459. 6	73, 386, 718
Beer	852, 977, 018. 0	684, 476, 800
Wine	54, 272, 656. 0	118, 476, 200

Mr. Woodcock's tables will be found on page 144, volume 1, Senate Document 307, of the Official Records of the National Commission on Law Observance and Enforcement.

I find, according to Mr. Woodcock's estimates, that there were 11,244,258.4 more gallons of whisky illegally manufactured and smuggled into the United States in 1930 than were legally withdrawn for consumption in 1919.

I find, according to Mr. Woodcock's estimates, that there were 74,204,144 more gallons of 12 per cent wines manufactured in the United States in 1930 than in 1919.

While Mr. Woodcock finds that there were 168,500,218 gallons more beer manufactured in 1919 than in 1930, yet it should be remembered that the beer manufactured in 1919 contained only 2.75 per cent of alcohol, while Mr. Woodcock estimates that the beer made in 1930 contained 3.4 per cent of alcohol. In alcoholic content, the home-brew illegally manufactured in the United States in 1930 was almost exactly the equivalent in alcohol of all the beer legally manufactured in 1919.

By reference to Table 34, page 47, of official Statistics Concerning Intoxicating Liquors, I find that in 1919 the Federal Government collected $117,839,602.21 on beer, and $365,211,252.26 on distilled spirits, including wines and cordials.

The total collections in 1919 were $483,050,854.47.

In 12 years, on the basis of the 1919 collections, the Federal Government has lost $5,796,610,253.64 in revenues.

On March 2, 1932, I was informed by the Ways and Means Committee of the House that the actual Treasury deficit for this year was $903,000,000, and that the estimated deficit for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, is $2,123,000,000.

If the estimates of the Director of Prohibition are to be relied upon, we have increased the consumption of whisky under prohibition by 11,244,258.4 gallons over the 1919 consumption; we have increased the consumption of wine by 74,204,144 gallons, and, in alcoholic content, we have not reduced the consumption of beer.

These figures are convincing proof that the Federal Government has thrown $5,796,610,253.54 in revenue out of the window without diminishing the consumption of alcoholic beverages that returned this amount of money to the Federal Treasury.

While there are no reliable statistics concerning the revenue losses to the several States and municipalities, the amount is stupendous. The Association Against the Prohibition Amendment has estimated these revenues at $480,000,000 per year; this estimate being approximately correct, the States and municipalities have lost an additional $4,800,000,000.

We can trace with absolute accuracy the loss of nearly $6,000,000,000 in Federal revenue, and with some degree of accuracy the loss of $4,800,000,000 in State and municipal revenue, a total of more than $10,500,000,000.

In addition to that, more than $300,000,000 have been frittered away in vain attempts to enforce this law, with the actual result that there has been a large increase in the consumption of liquor over the 1919 basis. I am using the 1919 figures because those are the records upon which the revenues were computed.

Where in the history of civilization was there ever such an economic folly?

We have, as I have shown, as in Illinois, increased prison population, in a decade of prohibition, more than during the 60 years before prohibition; and we have, as I have further shown, as in Missouri, more than trebled the cost of prison administration, notwithstanding that specific promises were made by the Anti-Saloon League of reducing the costs of prisons by 75 per cent.

The Federal Government alone has convicted 449,230 persons of violating the national prohibition act; it has arrested and placed the stigma of criminality upon a great many more.

The dollars and cents cost of the prohibition folly has been astounding. It has been the greatest legislative failure in the history of the United States. In 1919, the year before national prohibition, there were 1,367 deaths from alcoholism in the United States. In 1929 there were 4,339. These figures confirm the fact that either there was a much larger consumption of liquor in the United States in 1929, after 10 years of prohibition, than in 1919 or that the prohibition liquor was much more deadly to human life.

The Federal Government, in direct appropriations and losses in revenue, fritters away approximately $533,000,000 a year to save the lives of a handful of drunkards who drink themselves to death. I have just pointed out that in 1919, the year before prohibition, there were only 1,367 persons in the entire United States who died from alcoholism, but the Federal Government, which can afford to make these huge appropriations and sustain these enormous losses to save the lives of these few drunkards, and fails even in that, can afford to appropriate only ten and one-half million dollars per year for the support of the United States Public Health Service to protect the lives of 122,000,000 citizens and to try to save the lives of over a million persons who die every year, many of them from preventable diseases.

Our people, through their legislative bodies but not by direct vote, accepted the word of the professional prohibition propagandists that the eighteenth amendment would reduce taxes, eradicate a large part of the crime, improve public morals, and be a great blessing to the entire people. The exact reverse has been true. Taxes for prisons have trebled. Taxes for criminal investigation and prosecution have been greatly increased. Taxes for the maintenance of asylums and other charitable institutions have increased by leaps and bounds. In addition to the economic burdens pressed upon the backs of our taxpayers, we have experienced the greatest period of criminality in the history of the Nation; respect for law and official authority has been uprooted; we have become a nation of hypocrites, preaching the doctrine of total abstinence and practicing the art of manufacturing liquor in the homes; we have filled our jails and prisons to overflowing, and instead of having a crimeless Nation we are staggering under a crime cost estimated anywhere from three billions of dollars annually to eighteen billions. The official figures of the Prohibition Bureau offer conclusive proof that the so-called liquor traffic has been taken out of the hands of lawful manufacturers and distributors, who shared their profits with the Federal, State, and municipal governments, and put into the hands of criminals, who use their vast profits to finance crime and corrupt public officials not to interfere with their criminal operations.

Were it not for this experiment, it is entirely possible that the National Treasury would not be facing the tremendous deficit of over $2,000,000,000 and that thousands of municipalities would not be in the position they find themselves to-day, with no funds to pay school teachers, firemen, police officers, and other employees, with schools closing for lack of funds and taxpayers unable to meet the assessments.

Certainly the Ways and Means Committee would not be facing the tremendous task of balancing the Nation's Budget, which will mean the imposition of taxes on everyone in the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. LONERGAN].

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Chairman, I will utilize my time by placing in the RECORD a telegram referring to this bill which I received from the Connecticut Milk Producers Association.

The telegram referred to follows:

HARTFORD, CONN., March 2, 1932.

HON. AUGUSTINE LONERGAN,
House Office Building:

Connecticut dairy farmers learn that Congress threatens to scuttle Farm Board and cooperative marketing division by reducing appropriations beyond all reason and to the point of destroying efficiency. Connecticut dairy farmers want Farm Board maintained and sustained for purpose of helping agriculture in efficient marketing. We are not borrowing Farm Board money and don't intend to, but Farm Board should be sustained on a basis that will enable it to help the American farmer put himself in a position to deal on terms of equality in marketing so that he may cope with the combined capital and buying power of the agricultural trades. American agriculture can not be sound until this is done. The marketing act and Farm Board created by Congress offer most of anything invented for solution of this problem. Congress should sustain its pledge and carry out its program to help agriculture. Vacillating from the program is wasteful. A bad backward step breaks faith with the farmer. Hope we may have your cooperation in maintaining appropriations for the Farm Board in line with the original Budget committee proposal.

CONNECTICUT MILK PRODUCERS ASSOCIATION,
ROBERT C. MITCHELL, President.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. ARENTZ].

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, after the speech made by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. STEWART], I think it would be well to refer the Members to a statement made by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BACHMANN] on pages 4962 to 4965 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 7, 1930, on court congestion and prohibition enforcement.

Mr. LOZIER, Representative from Missouri, has advised me that fully four-fifths of all prisoners convicted in liquor violations in the State of Missouri were prosecuted by State and county authorities, and that of this four-fifths most of the cases originate in 105 or 106 counties of the State almost entirely in character. In but few of these cases does a Federal prohibition officer enter the picture. Only one-fourth of the liquor violators in the State prisons are the result of Federal prosecution, and of these the major part were apprehended, tried, and convicted in the cities of the State.

From this it is seen that when a State expresses its full authority it does a good job of taking care of its duties without waiting for the Federal authority to lead the way in cleaning up the mess. You can always trust State officials to interpret in no small degree the wishes of the people.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS].

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, this bill, known as the independent offices appropriation bill, carries the appropriations for all the independent offices or commissions of the Government not directly supervised by a Cabinet officer, including the Veterans' Administration, which has charge of disability allowances, hospitals, pensions, and, in fact, all expenditures for the ex-service men.

It is, therefore, appropriate in the consideration of this bill to discuss the question of the payment of the balance due on the adjusted-compensation certificates.

I favor the payment of the balance due on these certificates. Several bills have been introduced during the present session of Congress by different Members, and all are pending before the Ways and Means Committee. Some of these bills provide for direct payment in cash, others by Treasury certificates, and others by exchange of Government 4½ per cent bonds.

First, let me emphasize that I favor payment of the balance due on the certificates in cash. When the World War resolution was passed by Congress and legislation enacted providing for its prosecution we pledged all of our man power and all of our resources for the successful termination of the war. Nearly 5,000,000 of the splendid youth of our country joined the colors. Two and one-half million, after being quickly trained at home, were thrown across the sea. After brief training in the new methods of warfare they were thrown into action. Our supporting divisions held the line at Chateau Thierry July 15–18, 1918, turned the tide of battle, saved Paris, inspired confidence in our allies, and destroyed the morale of the enemy and the hope that they could win.

We won a glorious victory in the St. Mihiel drive on September 12, 1918, and under General Pershing we swept down the Woevre Valley under a barrage of a million shells to a triumphant victory.

Transferred to the Argonne, we fought with a valor never surpassed until the armistice was proclaimed on November 11, 1918, which amounted to an unconditional surrender.

Our ideals were upheld on foreign soil and our soldiers redeemed the pledge to return our flag unsullied and in triumph.

Unfortunately, some did not return. Many lie buried under the lilies of France. The remains of thousands of those who offered their lives on the altar of their country sleep in unknown and unmarked graves. They are represented by the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier erected in Arlington Cemetery, across the Potomac. They and their dependents are entitled to the undying gratitude of every citizen of this Republic. Thousands of other ex-service men, since their return, have broken under the strain and have either joined their fallen comrades across the shore or are lingering on this side awaiting the final summons.

They kept the faith. They met our most glorious expectations. Those that survive insist that we keep the faith when we pledged during the war all of the resources of our Nation.

Congress, recognizing that our intrepid soldiers have not been adequately compensated, enacted legislation to adjust their compensation and authorized that they be given certificates representing the additional meager compensation of $1.25 per day for overseas service and $1 per day for those ex-service men who had not yet been sent across the seas. Adjusted-service certificates were issued and delivered to all those who applied for them, payable 20 years after the date of issue, for the most part in 1945. Because of present business conditions they find themselves in a distressed condition. Millions of people, including thousands of ex-service men, are unemployed.

Congress has enacted legislation permitting the ex-service men to borrow 50 per cent of the value of their adjusted-compensation certificates. It is estimated by the Veterans' Administration that the total net amount due the ex-service men on their certificates, after deducting loans and interest, amounts to $2,185,705,921.17.

The interest charged on the loans made on these certificates is 4½ per cent. This interest rate is excessive, because the Government has been able to borrow at a less rate.

Legislation was introduced for the payment of the adjusted-service certificates during the last session of Congress. It was referred to the committee for consideration. In the place of it the committee reported a bill to increase loans up to 50 per cent of the value of the certificates. An effort was made to decrease the rate of interest, which I supported. This was defeated. The 4½ per cent interest now charged the ex-service men will absorb the greater part of the balance due on the principal of each certificate and but little, if any, will remain payable on these certificates in 1945.

As I have stated, there are a number of bills pending in Congress to pay the balance due on these certificates in full. Without regard to authorship, I favor any one of these bills that will result in the ex-service men receiving the balance due on the certificates in cash.

The Oklahoma Legion convention, held at Enid, Okla., in 1931, indorsed such a measure. The action of the national convention later, held at Detroit, does not, in my judgment, reflect the true sentiment of the ex-service men of my State, nor do I believe that it reflects the will of the ex-service men throughout the Nation.

Legion posts in my district earnestly favor the payment of these certificates in cash.

The latest expression of my State is found in the Democratic platform adopted February 20, 1932, as follows:

> The Democratic Party favors paying speedily the remainder of the bonus due the veterans of the World War, as a matter of common justice; and, further, because these payments being paid in all parts of the country will prove an economic betterment to all classes of business and enterprises in all sections of the Republic.

The argument always used against this, either on the stump or through the press, and which was used effectively at the Detroit convention, was that it would be too great a strain upon and an embarrassment to the Treasury.

In order to meet this objection, and as an alternative measure, I have prepared and have introduced a bill (H. R. 6584) authorizing the issuance and exchange at par of 4½ per cent tax-exempt negotiable bonds for the balance due on these certificates.

These bonds would be due and payable in 1945 when most of these certificates are due and payable. The adjusted-service certificates are obligations against the Treasury. These bonds would be obligations of the Treasury. The bonds would be tax exempt to the same extent as the 4¼ per cent Liberty bonds are now tax exempt. These bonds would bear interest at the rate of 4½ per cent and should readily sell at par. The present market value of the 4¼ per cent Liberty bonds is above par and to-day around $102.

Of course a 4½ per cent Government bond, tax exempt, would be absorbed readily at slightly above par, and even with the entire amount issued to pay these certificates all would be absorbed at par, and this would result in the ex-service men realizing cash for the face value of their certificates. The interest on the bonds would be payable semiannually.

The reason for making these bonds bear 4½ per cent interest is, first, because that rate of interest is charged the ex-service men by the Government on loans secured on their certificates; and, second, to insure that these bonds will not sell below par.

No one intellectually honest believes that a 4½ per cent tax-exempt Government bond will sell below par.

My bill is the answer to the argument that payment in cash would be too great a strain upon the Treasury at this time.

The bonds would be issued in denominations of $50, $100, and $500, and any fractional amounts due on the certificates would be payable in cash. The bill authorizes the issuance of such bonds to provide funds to pay the fractional amounts to be paid in cash and the semiannual interest on the bonds exchanged, all due in 1945.

The ex-service men are not so concerned about the wording of the legislation as they are in the result of it.

Let me repeat that I introduced my bill as an alternative measure for the consideration of the Ways and Means Committee and of Congress, in the event any of the bills to pay the balance due on these certificates in cash fail to meet with favorable consideration.

Conditions throughout the country are deplorable. The depression has continued without any evidence of turning the corner. It is estimated there are between six and eight million people out of employment. This legislation, in my opinion, will do more to relieve the situation than any other legislation proposed or enacted by Congress. There is not a community in the country it will not reach. It will affect almost every family because nearly every family was represented by a boy who joined the colors when our Nation's flag was in peril.

We enacted much legislation both during and subsequent to the World War for the benefit of the ex-service men, to aid their dependents at home, for insurance, for vocational training, for disability compensation, for hospital treatment, and for pensions, but this is totally inadequate to compensate those who offered their lives as a supreme sacrifice upon the altar of their country.

The enactment of any one of these bills would result in the distribution of $2,185,705,921.17 throughout the country. Every State would receive its share. There would be paid to the ex-service men in the State of Oklahoma $39,722,184.80, and to the ex-service men of the second congressional district, which I represent, as follows: Adair County, $245,244.72; Cherokee County, $290,351.40; Haskell County, $269,509.92; McIntosh County, $414,236.88; Muskogee County, $1,103,966.88; Okmulgee County, $939,993.96; Sequoyah County, $324,173.10; and Wagoner County, $372,753.36.

No other legislation that Congress could enact would have the effect of so completely relieving the depression. It would enable many of the ex-service men and the members of their families to pay taxes due, which would not only benefit them individually but enable them to contribute their share toward the local and State governments and make possible the continuance of schools which are largely supported through taxation. Many rural schools are being closed because the people are unable to pay their taxes. It would enable them to pay mortgages upon their homes and farm lands and relieve their minds of threatened foreclosure. Their purchasing power would be increased and more food would be purchased for themselves and feed for their work stock which would immediately favorably influence the price of all farm products. It would revive the business of merchants who would be able to sell more goods, bank deposits would be increased, and the banks would in turn be able to loan money upon more favorable terms to those in need of funds for business reasons or to meet urgent necessities.

There is no character of business, great or small, that the payment of the balance due on these certificates to the ex-service men would not materially affect.

Much of the legislation enacted by Congress may affect one class of business or another, but the payment of the balance due on these certificates would favorably affect every individual and every class of business in the country. Every family would be either directly or indirectly affected. It would increase the volume of money in circulation, expand credit, and thereby enhance the price of both agricultural and manufactured products. The unemployment situation would be greatly relieved and wages increased, because this additional amount of money placed in circulation would enable every unemployed man either to return to his own character of work or trade or enable him to procure other employment. In my judgment, there is no other legislation that would so universally and favorably affect the great mass of citizens throughout the entire country extending into every section and into every community.

We are making every effort to restore prosperity. This legislation would assist more people and be of greater benefit to them than any other that has thus far been proposed or enacted.

The purchasing power of the people, because of the restriction of credit and because there is no market for agricultural or manufactured products, is at a minimum. The enactment of this legislation would restore the purchasing power of the people. For that reason it would enhance the price of farm products now selling at ruinously low prices and below the cost of production. Wheat at harvest time sold at from 25 to 30 cents per bushel. Corn at gathering time sold around 18 cents per bushel, oats from 12 to 15 cents per bushel, and cotton around 1½ cents per pound. Other farm products, including livestock, are still selling at ruinously low prices and below the cost of production.

I know farming conditions out of a lifetime of experience; and during my entire service in Congress, and particularly during the past few years, I have joined in every effort to secure for the farmers the cost of production plus a reasonable profit. I voted for the debenture plan, which is the only way to make the tariff applicable to farm products, but this was twice vetoed by the President. Everyone knows that a tariff of 42 cents per bushel on wheat is not effective when only one forty-fifth of 1 per cent of the amount of wheat we produce is imported into this country. The same is true of the 25 cents per bushel tariff on corn, when only one-thirteenth of 1 per cent of the amount of corn we produce is imported. Such legislation is an idle gesture to deceive the farmers. However, if the debenture plan were enacted giving the farmers 50 per cent of this tariff on all farm products exported to foreign markets, it would make it effective. The domestic prices would respond to prices received for the exported products.

I voted for the equalization fee, which by legislation completely organized the farmers, and those who had given their best thought to it commended it as the most effective means, through combined cooperative marketing, of securing for the farmers the full value of their farm products and a fair profit.

The administration of the Farm Board has been a disappointment, and the farmers have not realized a favorable reaction through the actions of that board. They had a right to believe that a sympathetic administration, with a revolving fund of $500,000,000 for their use, would bring them relief.

The causes for the depression have been discussed on the floor of the House, in the Senate, in the press, and on the lecture platforms, on every street corner, and around every fireside. It is generally agreed that it is due in part: (1) To conditions growing out of the World War; (2) to the contraction of the currency and to restriction of credits, because when commodities are scarce they sell at high prices, and the same is true of money; (3) to the investment in foreign securities; (4) to speculation on the stock market; and (5) to the enactment of the 1930 tariff act, which shut off our foreign markets and prevented the exporting of our surplus products, which, thrown upon our domestic markets, depressed prices. We need to export approximately 200,000,000 bushels of wheat each year. Our domestic market absorbs the rest. We need to export about 60 per cent of our cotton crop. Our domestic spinners consume the remainder. The tariff has shut off our foreign market for practically all of our agricultural products and many of our manufactured products as well.

We have enacted legislation during the present session of Congress creating the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for the purpose of giving financial aid to the railroads, the banks, and other corporations or financial institutions.

Part of these funds are to be loaned direct to farmers. Legislation has been passed making additional paper eligible for rediscount with the Federal reserve banks so as to make frozen securities held by the banks more liquid in cases of emergency. The relief of these, of course, indirectly affects the masses of the people and is an effort to restore prosperity and confidence. We have enacted a land bank bill to provide more funds for the farm land banks and in effect with legislative instructions to defer foreclosures until the depression passes, which should measurably help all farmers who have secured loans through these banks.

We have enacted legislation authorizing an appropriation from which farmers may borrow money to form organizations for their benefit.

The House has passed a bill authorizing an additional expenditure of $132,500,000 as Federal aid to highways. This bill is pending in the Senate. It directs the use of local labor. It will assist in giving additional employment, add value to farm lands, and release local funds to build more farm-to-market roads.

Forty million bushels of wheat held by the Grain Stabilization Corporation are to be distributed to feed the hungry in need of assistance.

Other legislation is in the course of preparation and will be brought up for consideration before Congress adjourns.

The entire subject of agriculture should be studied and a comprehensive legislative program enacted which will result in better prices for farm products through better marketing facilities.

Old-age pension legislation has been reported to Congress and will unquestionably receive favorable consideration during the present session.

We have passed a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States changing the time for the inauguration of President and Vice President and changing the terms of Members of Congress in the hope that they will respond more readily to public sentiment throughout the country by convening within a shorter time after their election.

Having considered this legislation referred to for the benefit of the business interests of the country, we should press favorable action before the adjournment of Congress upon legislation which will make sure that the balance due the ex-service men on their adjusted-compensation certificates is paid in full in cash, which would benefit all of the people of the entire country.

Congress enacted legislation, over my vigorous protest, known as the moratorium bill, extending the time for the foreign governments to pay the interest on their indebtednesses amounting to $252,000,000, which is extended, not for one year as is generally believed, but is to be repaid over a period of 10 years. This legislation was passed in the face of the fact that we are making every effort to find new sources of revenue to meet our own Government needs.

This legislation to pay the balance due on the adjusted-service certificates will not only recognize the gallant services of those who made it possible to return our flag in triumphant victory during the World War, but will benefit practically every family in the country, aid every community, and, in my judgment, do more to restore prosperity than all the legislation that either has been passed or will be enacted during the present session of Congress.

If it be argued that the payment of the balance due on these certificates in cash will be too great a strain upon the Treasury at this time, let me answer by saying that I have offered a bill which would provide for the exchange of 4½ per cent tax-exempt Government bonds for these certificates, which bonds should sell at par, would be due in 1945, when most of the certificates are due, and which would result in the ex-service men receiving the full value for the balance due on their adjusted-service certificates.

Nor does our obligation end here. Additional hospital facilities should be furnished sufficient to insure the hospitalization of the soldiers of all wars, including the World War, for sickness and disability, whether incurred during the service or thereafter.

Pension legislation should be enacted to take care of the widows and dependents of soldiers of the World War on a parity with legislation for widows and dependents of veterans of other wars.

Legislation should also be enacted liberalizing the administration of the laws enacted for the benefit of disabled ex-service men so as to insure sympathetic administration both as to the consideration of claims for disability compensation and for pensions.

Finally let me add that during peace times Congress should enact legislation which will insure the conscription of wealth, as well as universal service, in the event of any future war. Nothing will have a better effect for the prevention of future wars and a guaranty of peace.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I was very much interested in my colleague's discussion. As far as I can discern he is advocating a plan very similar to one which I introduced and presented before the Ways and Means Committee when this matter was first under consideration. I believed then and I believe now it would have been the best solution of the problem.

Mr. HASTINGS. I am glad to have my bill commended by the gentleman from the State of Washington, whom I know is interested both in restoring prosperity and in the welfare of the ex-service men of the country.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Does the gentleman expect to have hearings on his bill?

Mr. HASTINGS. I understand the Ways and Means Committee will hold hearings on this and other similar measures as soon as the tax bill is reported and out of the way.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. LEAVITT].

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Chairman, I have asked for this time to call attention to a matter entirely different from any yet presented this afternoon.

It is not customary to announce to the Congress of the United States the passing of any private citizen of this country unless he has achieved distinction of the first order. We announce here the passing of former Members of this body and of the Senate. We announce here the passing of few other men, and only those who have given great service to their country. Recalling that standard, I have chosen to announce the passing of one who has graced the history of my State of Montana. He was the Indian chief named Plenty Coos, or perhaps more correctly Plenty Coups. He was a man whose leadership among his people was such that when at the close of the Great War the body of the Unknown Soldier was returned for burial in Arlington Cemetery and a choice was to be made of a chieftain to represent our Indian citizenship, one worthy to speak for and represent all of them, the choice fell on Plenty Coos, the chief of the Crows.

You will find to-day in the amphitheater in Arlington Cemetery, among those tributes that were then placed upon the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier, among the bronze plaques and wreaths and flags of the great nations of the earth, the feathered war bonnet and coup stick of Plenty Coos. By his hand they were laid as a tribute of all the Indian tribes and nations upon the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier. There to-day they recall the fact that there was no group of our citizenship that gave more bravely and more fully to the sacrifices of that war than did the Indian people.

Many of you perhaps noticed this morning an Associated Press item reading as follows:

PLENTY COOS, 85, CHIEF OF CROW INDIANS, DIES

BILLINGS, MONT., March 4.—Plenty Coos, chief of the Crow Tribe, who represented the American Indians at the burial of the Unknown Soldier at Arlington Cemetery, died to-day at his reservation home at Pryor, south of here. For many months Chief Plenty Coos had been ill, blind, and crippled. He was 85 years old.

Known as a chieftain particularly skillful in negotiations with the Government, Plenty Coos was often the central figure in ceremonies honoring celebrities coming to this section. Among the notables he inducted into the Crow Tribe were Marshal Foch, Vice President Curtis, former Gov. Frank O. Lowden, of Illinois, and Maj. Gen. James G. Harbord.

It is not the custom of the Crow Indians to give this honor of adoption indiscriminately, and it was with the greatest of dignity that Chief Plenty Coos conducted ceremonies of this kind. A year ago last fall, when Mrs. Leavitt and I were on our way back east to our duties in Washington, we stopped on the Crow Reservation for a council. We found that a ceremony had been arranged, and Chief Plenty Coos adopted Mrs. Leavitt into the Crow Tribe, the first and only woman who has ever been given that honor. [Applause.] The chief presented her with a dress of red material upon which there were shown many elks' teeth. It was a signal and particular honor which came to us through the adoption of my wife because of their appreciation of her. That was the last occasion upon which I saw that fine and stately old leader of his race.

I speak, therefore, with somewhat of personal sentiment with regard to the passing of this great man. I speak of him as a great man because he had in him such elements of leadership among his people as marked him as a statesman. His history has been written, and those of you who are interested can find it in a book entitled "American," written by Frank B. Linderman, a Montana author. It is one of the most interesting tales ever written about an American Indian. It traces back to the days when the Indians were living the tribal life of the buffalo days. It depicts his exploits as a warrior and a hunter. It shows him as the wise counsellor of his people when the white man came into his country. His life was in truth a symbol of the absorption of the American Indian into the citizenship of the United States. His was one of the finest characters I have ever known.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Montana three additional minutes.

Mr. LEAVITT. Chief Plenty Coos was an orator of the first order. I have heard him on various occasions in councils I had the honor of attending when the affairs of his tribe were being discussed. He spoke, of course, through an interpreter, drawing his imagery from the mountains and from the sky, from the wind whispering through the grass. Always he was calling attention to the needs of his people, not speaking particularly about their wrongs, although it was plain to see that the injustice that had been too often meted out to the Indian race tugged at his heart. He was speaking about the future, about the things we ought to do for the children of the Indian race, and what they ought to do for themselves. He was speaking for the young men and young women, for the boys and for the girls; the opportunities they should have through education in our schools, the opportunities they should have through proper training in health and in access to good hospitals; the rights they had to their homes and lands, and the training they should have to enable them to produce the things they need for their welfare and for their health. These were the things that were always in the mind of Plenty Coos. His heart and voice were ever for the good of his people. When he came here to Washington representing them these were likewise the things he presented here. He pointed a way which his tribesmen will be proud to follow.

It is a matter of sincere regret to me to announce to you the passing of this supreme representative of the Indian race. He was a man of such caliber and such high character, and his service was so outstanding, that it is entirely fitting that the American Congress should pause for a moment to do him reverence. [Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER].

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, the adoption of the conference report on the Norris resolution by the House Tuesday and by the Senate Wednesday has prompted me to take the floor at this time in order to pay a tribute to a former colleague, a man who was not of my political faith, but who was my friend. I refer to Hays White, of Kansas, who went on a long, long journey about a year or year and a half ago.

When I entered the Sixty-eighth Congress one of the committees to which I was assigned was the Committee on the Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress. Hays White was chairman of this committee. He was cast, like a Viking, in a heroic mold, but behind his rough exterior there was an educated and cultured mind.

In the first session of the committee in which the Norris resolution was considered, in the course of the debate, he incidentally referred to something that had been said in debate in the Constitutional Convention. I looked at the old and seemingly unsophisticated gentleman and wondered what that rough plainsman knew about the debates out of which came our Federal Constitution, and at the first opportunity I made bold to interrogate him as ingeniously as I could with a view of ascertaining to what extent he was familiar with the proceedings of the convention that formulated our organic law. To my amazement and pleasure I found that he had an intimate knowledge of the proceedings and debates of the Constitutional Convention and of the political history of our Nation.

This was the beginning of a warm but rather unusual friendship. Some might think that our tastes were so different there would be little in common between us. But I was attracted by what he knew and by a sincere desire to learn something by my contact with him, though I was conscious of my inability to give much in return. Very frequently I met him at the close of a busy session and engaged him in conversation, to the end that I might draw from his storehouse of wisdom a little knowledge to add to my limited and none too generous stock of information.

He was familiar with the classics, and had a fair comprehension of the governmental philosophy of Solon, Lycurgus, Aristides, Pericles, Justinian, Calbert, Richelieu, Rousseau, John Locke, Peel, Pitt, Burke, Mill, Bentham, Adam Smith, and Charles James Fox; and he thoroughly understood the principles and policies of the men who made this Nation—Washington, Jefferson, Hamilton, Madison, Franklin, John Adams, the Pinckneys, John Dickinson, Roger Sherman, Gouverneur Morris, Robert Morris, George Mason, Pierce Butler, and other outstanding giants in our colonial, Revolutionary, and early constitutional history.

As a Member of this body and as chairman of the Committee on Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress, he labored with unfailing patience and with unremitting assiduity to bring about the submission of the so-called Norris "lame-duck" constitutional amendment.

Providence decreed that he should not live to see the consummation of his ardent hopes. Well advanced in years, broken by toil and the vicissitudes of fortune, weary and footsore, he turned aside from the caravan, sought the refreshing shade of the palm trees, and surrendered himself to the gentle embrace of sleep that in this finite life knows no waking.

He now abides in the marble palace of Valhalla, in the great Hall of Odin, in cloudless, sunlit, zephr-carressed, beatific Elysian fields, where stirless silence wooes sinless souls, celestial rapture is unbroken, and where manumitted spirits may taste the charms of Heaven, experience the humanly inconceivable and indescribable tranquillity of the Infinite, and enjoy the intoxicating reveries unknown to human ken.

If the spirits of just men are made perfect by the alchemy which attends that change of state that for the lack of a better term we call death; if the departed from their empyrean abode can look back through the nebulous zone that separates the finite from the infinite; if those with whom we touched elbows in this earth life; if those who walked with us along life's crowded highway; if those kindred spirits who were bound to us as with hoops of steel; if those who were interested in our governmental institutions and who ably served their day and generation; if those who have crossed over the Great Divide and have been hidden from our sight by dipping horizons that set limits to death's tideless, waveless sea; if those who have passed into the silent land may still be interested in things terrestrial or in the perplexing problems of those who linger this side of the tomb, then methinks at this good hour the disembodied spirit of Hays White is quickened with unmeasurable exaltation and rejoices in the realization that his friends kept the faith, battled on, and contended earnestly for a principle and policy he considered wholesome and vital to our institutions if the concepts of our constitutional fathers are to be preserved.

Knowing Hays White as I did, and appreciating the admirable qualities of mind and heart with which a benign Providence had endowed him, I thought it not improper, following the adoption of the conference report on the Norris resolution, to halt the deliberations of this body for a few moments to pay a genuine and well-deserved tribute to a former colleague who believed in this resolution and industriously labored to bring about its submission.

Hays White, robust son of the great West, has gone the way of all the earth—down the long, long trail. He has paid the debt that all the sons and daughters of Adam owe to nature. The silver cord has been loosed, the golden bowl has been broken, the heartstrings have been palsied, and death has kissed the lips of my friend into eternal silence. After life's fitful fever he sleeps well. Peace to his ashes; rest to his soul. [Applause.]

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. AMLIE].

Mr. AMLIE. Mr. Chairman, it is my desire to talk on that part of the independent offices appropriation bill dealing with the appropriation for the Federal Trade Commission. I want to register a protest against the manner in which this particular appropriation has been cut. The original cut provided in the Budget on this particular item was 28 per cent, the highest cut made in any appropriation in all the figures of the Bureau of the Budget. Twenty-eight per cent is unusually high when we consider that the average reduction in the figures set out by the Bureau of the Budget is only 1.3 per cent. I realize as a new Member—I did not at first as I do now—that it is necessary that the Members accord to the decisions of the various committees a great deal of consideration. I have noticed that in the reports of the committees—the presumption is that those reports are correct—that what the committee has done has been arrived at after considerable study and consideration of all the facts; but I feel that in the case of the appropriation for the Federal Trade Commission the recommendation that has been made is not entitled to any such favorable consideration. I do not feel that the recommendation of the committee is entitled to any presumption in its favor. I shall tell why. In 1928 the Senate ordered two investigations and directed the Federal Trade Commission to proceed with them. The Senate called for an investigation of utilities in the United States and an investigation of the chain stores. Those investigations have been going on ever since. The utility investigation is probably the biggest and most important investigation ever undertaken by any governmental department or commission. When the Bureau of the Budget made its report it advised and recommended that the allotment made for those two investigations be stricken off altogether. That seemed particularly peculiar in view of the fact that this investigation has gone on for four years and that it is as vital a question to-day as it was in 1928, and after a million and three-quarters dollars has been expended upon the investigations and only about $400,000 was needed to finish them. It was strange that it should be dropped out at that particular point and the work go for nothing. About the time that the Budget figures came out it did not seem possible to some of us that the Appropriations Committee would accept any such recommendation striking from the work of the commission the most important thing that it has ever undertaken. I was astounded last Wednesday when the preliminary report on the bill came out from the Committee on Appropriations to find that the preliminary bill followed precisely the recommendations of the Budget Bureau. Before the bill came out I had heard for a number of days vicious and sinister rumors going around Washington to the effect that the Democrats and Republicans were both ready to scrap this particular investigation.

When that came out I immediately got in touch with some of my friends and they expressed themselves to me as feeling the same way about it. They said that they had heard these rumors. That was on Thursday morning. In the afternoon the bill was changed so as to provide that the cut should not come entirely out of these two investigations, but that out of the reduced appropriation of something like a million and a quarter, $300,000 was to be used to finish up the investigation of the utility question and the chain stores. I do not feel that that represents any study on the part of the Committee on Appropriations. I had hoped that they would stand on the original bill as they reported it out on Wednesday, because I felt certain in my own mind that I could easily have gotten enough Members on both sides of the aisle to have put back in the bill the amount necessary to finish up those two studies without crippling the general work of the commission.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AMLIE. Yes.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Chairman, I am very much interested in the gentleman's discussion, because I am a member of the Committee on Appropriations. Of course, the gentleman understands that the committee is so well organized that we usually follow the lead of our subcommittees. Of necessity we have to do that, because individually we do not have time to make studies necessary as to the various questions. We have an onerous job, and we get a good deal of criticism. I am wondering if the gentleman will not talk this matter over with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM], the chairman of the subcommittee, after he has made his speech, and his speech is a real contribution to the cause. I have talked with people who have the same views the gentleman has about this matter, and some I know very well, who are connected with the Federal Trade Commission. I, as one member of the Committee on Appropriations, am anxious that none of the activities of the Federal Trade Commission should be curtailed. But I have another duty on the other side, and I am trying to follow my leadership and cut where cuts can be made, sometimes to my own detriment and hurt. Talking seriously, not facetiously, I hope the gentleman will follow up his contribution with a conference on this matter with the subcommittee to see if we can not, before we get to a vote upon it, iron out these differences to the end that this great constructive bureau, the Federal Trade Commission, may carry on and do the work it has been doing.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman first permit me to get through.

Mr. AMLIE. I hope the gentleman will help me get more time.

Mr. ABERNETHY. The gentleman will be able to get all the time he wants. I think I can get the time for the gentleman.

The gentleman is making a splendid speech and has struck an idea that has been running in my mind, and has really made an impression on me, whether he has on anybody else or not. I hope that will be some help to the gentleman. I want to learn more about this. I would like for the gentleman to give us all the light he can on this subject. I thank the gentleman for allowing me to interrupt him thus far.

Mr. AMLIE. I will be very happy to go over this matter with any member of the committee with whom I may have that privilege. I realize that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. ABERNETHY] has stated a problem that confronts every member of the committee.

I shall digress here for a moment, on account of the remarks of the gentleman from North Carolina, and present a thought. The members of the Committee on Appropriations must choose between various departments the amounts that must be allotted to each. I am going to compare two departments that have grown up side by side. I am now referring to the Federal Trade Commission and the Bureau of Foreign Commerce in the Department of Commerce.

In 1920 the appropriation for each was approximately $1,000,000. The appropriation since Mr. Hoover took charge of the Department of Commerce in 1920 has gone up, until the average annual expenditure of that department was approximately $4,000,000 during the last five or six years. The past year it has been $5,000,000.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin 10 additional minutes.

Mr. AMLIE. I mention this because the two departments represent a different approach, originating in a different philosophy of government. I might say to the gentlemen on the Democratic side of the Chamber that, in my opinion, the creation of the Federal Trade Commission has been perhaps the most constructive thing that they have done during the past 20 years. That was created upon the theory that I have heard expressed here dozens of times since this session of Congress began—the feeling that it is possible on the part of the Government to regulate unfair practices, to curb monopolistic tendencies on the part of great wealth, and to give the small business man a chance to prosper; to protect the consumer so that the law of supply and demand may work out and solve our difficulties.

On the other hand, there is the philosophy which feels that it is commerce that keeps everything going, and if we can simply keep commerce stimulated we are going to have prosperity as a direct and natural result. To that end we are spending now about $5,000,000 a year by maintaining commercial agents in foreign countries. I realize that the representatives of the Department of Commerce in foreign countries have a tremendous task on their hands. They have been trying to sell American goods in those countries, and they have been met with the fact that those countries have been unable to buy because they have been unable to sell their goods in the United States because of high protective tariff barriers.

The Department of Commerce found a way to get around that. They found if they could get these foreign countries to borrow money in the United States, and issue bonds, they could still keep commerce going. I am going to quote to you a statement from the annual report of the Department of Commerce of 1928, found on page 135:

> A record-breaking volume of foreign stocks and bonds was offered to the American investing public last year. This partly explains the increased use made of the store of information on the finances of foreign governments and corporations that is on file in the bureau. American underwriters of foreign securities are now turning to the finance and investment division in constantly growing numbers for data to guide them in foreign financial commitments.

Going on:

> The services of this division, from their nature, are not easily measured in dollars and cents. Though closely associated with important financial transactions, the division can take no active part in promoting them. It operates in a field where the greatest service is often rendered by furnishing detailed, accurate information not readily obtainable elsewhere.

Those are significant statements. That was in 1928. The Department of Commerce is taking credit for the fact that they got American investors to invest approximately $1,500,000,000 in South America. They are now catching up with this sort of work and the American investor realizes that if he takes the Department of Commerce at its own word, the Department of Commerce itself was responsible for leading those people to make investments upon which they have taken losses to-day, in South America alone, of $1,115,000,000. This is the department, the appropriation for which we have already passed, with a very minor cut. They are going to spend approximately $5,000,000. It has been approved. The Bureau of the Budget reduced this department only 8 per cent, whereas they have reduced the Federal Trade Commission by 28 per cent; figuring the 1931 deficiency through the completion of two separate investigations ordered by the Senate, the actual reduction is 34 per cent.

On the other hand, let us consider the type of work that has been done these many years by the Federal Trade Commission. I am going to mention the investigation of the Pittsburgh plus. That has been perhaps one of the most important investigations ever conducted by any department of the Government. The benefits of the Pittsburgh plus have accrued to the eastern sea coast. It has particularly benefited the Middle West and the Far West. The investigation of the Pittsburgh plus was initiated by the Federal Trade Commission. It was conducted over a number of years. Eight years ago, on the order of the Federal Trade Commission, the practice was abandoned.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin 10 additional minutes.

Mr. AMLIE. As a result of the abandonment of the Pittsburgh-plus plan, through the activities of the Federal Trade Commission, there has been a saving to the people of the West and the Northwest, according to the statement of Mr. Howard, former president of the American Farm Bureau, of $30,000,000 a year. Certainly that was true on the basis of the prices of steel back in 1923 and 1924.

It is hard to calculate the importance of these measures. I want to mention another matter. Since they started the investigation of the utilities a couple of years ago, one change alone that has resulted from this investigation has been the abandonment on the part of the Electric Bond & Share Co., one of the largest holding companies in the utility business, of certain service charges to their subsidiaries, charged to the consumer as an operating expense. They have reduced their service fees in an amount of approximately $1,000,000 a year. Two other companies have made reductions in similar service charges aggregating approximately $1,000,000 a year, which have come about as a direct result of this important investigation. By abandoning these practices these companies have admitted that they were unjustified in the first instance. On this item alone the utility investigation has resulted in a saving to the patrons of these three companies of $2,000,000 a year.

That is a continuing matter. It may be argued that was not the result of the investigation, but I might say this Federal Trade Commission had a tremendously hard time in getting access to those figures. They were denied access to them by officials of the Electric Bond & Share Co., and this question is now in court, but at least this reduction is an actuality to-day.

I want to point to another very important result and reason why this investigation is very bitterly fought. The hearings on the public-utility question have demonstrated and given evidence of some very interesting cases of write ups. The testimony taken so far shows this: That the value of certain property bought by the Appalachian Power Co. was $72,000,000; that after it was purchased it was written up to $139,000,000; that is, $66,000,000 of fictitious value was written into this corporation and its securities foisted upon the American public. That is only one instance. There is another instance where property bought was written up to the extent of $55,000,000, or an increase over the actual value of 124 per cent.

Now, I will say this: Some States have very powerful rate commissions, such as Massachusetts, primarily, and Wisconsin. I could start on the other end of the line and work up, but perhaps I had better refrain. However, some States have virtually no protection of any kind in matters of this kind, so that an investigation of this kind becomes doubly important for that reason.

Investigation in regard to chain stores is equally important.

This body was originally created in 1904 under President Roosevelt's régime, when it was known as the Bureau of Corporations. Under President Wilson, in 1914, it became the Federal Trade Commission of to-day. It was this body that gathered together facts upon which all price-fixing during the World War was based. It is one of the most constructive departments in the Government. It is one of the few departments of the Government that is functioning in behalf of the consumer. It is perhaps the only body ever created by Congress that has remained entirely responsive to the wishes of Congress. This body has time and time again created executive departments and has made appropriations for them, and it has found that as soon as they have been created they are entirely outside of the control of Congress. But here is one body that has always been responsive to the wishes of Congress. It has had burdens thrust upon it.

At the last session of Congress the Senate thrust upon it two investigations and asked for reports by December 1, 1931. They went ahead, as they have done during the past 10 years and incurred expenses of approximately $70,000. They presented a deficiency to be included in the deficiency appropriation bill for $70,000, believing they could rely upon the orders of the Senate, but that matter has been disallowed, though the practice followed has been a matter of 10 years' standing.

It seems to me if there is anybody that this Congress ought to protect, particularly the Members on this side of the aisle, it is the Federal Trade Commission. It is the one body that is carrying out their philosophy of government. If you are ready to scuttle the Federal Trade Commission I have no further comment to make. There is nothing so closely allied to the Democratic conception and policy of government as is the work of the Federal Trade Commission.

If I might be pardoned for making a suggestion, it would seem to me it would only be poetic justice, on the basis of the accomplishments of these two bodies, if the $5,000,000 we are giving to the Department of Foreign Commerce, whose actions have caused us to lose $1,115,000,000 in investments in South America, were taken from that body and given to the Federal Trade Commission and the one million and a quarter given to the Federal Trade Commission given to the Department of Foreign Commerce. If that were done, it would seem to me, it would be but poetic justice.

Mr. BOYLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AMLIE. Yes.

Mr. BOYLAN. The gentleman knows, of course, that the subcommittee did not reduce the Budget estimate in this case, does he not?

Mr. AMLIE. That is true.

Mr. BOYLAN. Not a single dollar.

Mr. AMLIE. The Federal Trade Commission itself reduced its budget over $105,000 before they presented their figures as against last year.

Mr. BOYLAN. But the subcommittee did not reduce the Budget estimate a single dollar.

Mr. AMLIE. They had taken the cut before they came to the subcommittee.

Mr. BOYLAN. They were given the entire amount recommended by the Budget.

Mr. AMLIE. If you intend to stand with the President and back of the Bureau of the Budget, I am sorry for the Democratic Party. [Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself five minutes.

Mr. Chairman, there was no purpose on the part of the subcommittee reporting this bill, or the full committee, to scuttle the Federal Trade Commission or even to hamper or in any way interfere with the two investigations to which the gentleman has made particular reference; that is, the chain-store investigation and the gas and utility investigation.

The Members of the House will recall the fact that at the last session of Congress in order to facilitate and complete the chain store and utility investigations the Congress itself added a sizable sum of money to the amount recommended by the Appropriations Committee, thereby emphasizing the special interest of Congress in these particular investigations. Now, what happened? The Federal Trade Commission instead of pursuing these investigations with the money that Congress had provided, diverted the money and diverted the personnel to investigations that were subsequently ordered by another body, thereby creating a deficit in their pay roll, which now confronts them, of some $70,000 for the remainder of this fiscal year, and retarding the particular investigations for which we specifically appropriated money.

There is no disposition to be other than perfectly fair with the Federal Trade Commission. It has been the policy that has heretofore been pursued by the commission that when another body would order investigations and provide no funds for the investigation, the Federal Trade Commission would make the investigations with such funds as they had, and, subsequently, get a deficiency appropriation to make it up. On this particular occasion the Bureau of the Budget refused to sanction their request for a deficiency appropriation of $70,000, and not only that but reduced their request for appropriations something over $400,000.

The subcommittee has brought the report of the Budget to the Congress. It is a matter for this House to pass on. We have no pride of authorship about it. We have no desire to unnecessarily hamper the Federal Trade Commission, but we do have this desire, and it shall be our purpose in whatever legislation may be passed here, to specifically earmark and set apart a definite sum that must be used to complete these particular investigations; otherwise, like Tennyson's proverbial brook, they run on and on and on forever, and any facts gathered or any studies made or any survey that might be presented to Congress on chain stores and utilities would be so antiquated and so out of date by the time it finally came to us that it would be of no value.

As I say, the matter is before the Congress for its consideration. The gentleman can offer his amendment and it can be considered by the committee. The gentleman will know that there has been a tacit understanding between the minority and majority members of the Appropriations Committee that in the interest of economy we will in no case go beyond the budgetary estimates. I do not mean to say this is such a hard-and-fast rule that the Appropriations Committee will not depart from it. So far it has not done so. We feel it is in the interest of good legislation and of safe legislation in these perilous times to adhere as closely as possible to the budgetary estimates, and wherever possible come under them. We did not reduce the Federal Trade Commission at all. We gave them just what the Budget estimated; and, in the consideration of this legislation here and in the Senate, if it appears proper to add to the fund allotted to them, then, of course, that will be done.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. ABERNETHY. As I understand, the underlying purpose of the gentleman, as I caught it here and as I caught it in the Appropriations Committee, that you desire to earmark this appropriation so that if the other body adds investigations that provisions for the investigation should be made there. I want to sustain the gentleman; and, as I understand it, that is the underlying principle here.

Mr. WOODRUM. The underlying principle is exactly what the bill shows. We proposed out of the approximately $1,250,000 that we give the Federal Trade Commission at least $300,000 is to be used for the chain-store and utility investigations; and entirely aside from trying to scuttle the Federal Trade Commission, we were expressing our special interest in these particular investigations, and for that purpose earmarked the money.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I think the gentleman and myself understand each other, and I was trying to get at the purpose of the gentleman for the membership.

Mr. WOODRUM. I am perfectly willing to answer the gentleman if I can.

Mr. ABERNETHY. If I catch the purpose of the gentleman in making the statement, as I understand the gentleman's purpose, and that it is the intent of the Appropriations Committee, which is practically unanimous, that we do not want in any way to hamper the Federal Trade Commission, but we want the funds that are allocated for a specific purpose used for that purpose, and not diverted. Is not that the idea?

Mr. WOODRUM. That is exactly correct.

Mr. AMLIE. Is not this Federal Trade Commission a little different from other commissions? Is it not true that Congress has been making demands on it without regard to appropriations? The Federal Trade Commission is willing to follow the rule in good faith.

Mr. WOODRUM. I think the gentleman has correctly stated the situation.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a man who is really a friend of another will not do that which will temporarily benefit him but which ultimately may ruin him. I am as good a friend to our Government employees as any man in Congress. I have backed them in every laudable undertaking they have espoused.

There have been some instances when they have made demands which I deemed unwise and I could not support. In the case of the LaGuardia amendment it ought to be thoroughly understood that there was nothing in the committee proposal he caused to be stricken out that reduced the salary of any employee of this Government. It merely sought to prevent increases of salary during this depression.

I am a friend of the postal employees. I have helped my friend the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] provide for them all the way down the line. But we will not benefit these men by now increasing their salaries in this time of depression, which the LaGuardia amendment will do, when we are getting complaints from everybody else in our district that they are getting already more than other people and more than the other people think they are entitled to. Was not that a proper provision for the Appropriations Committee to put in the bill that no salaries should be increased; and was not it a provision that the majority could expect the minority to support? And yet on a committee proposition of that kind to prevent salary increases you found, on the LaGuardia amendment to strike out the provision, all of the Republican leaders absent.

There is no Republican leader for whom I have a more profound respect and regard than the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON]. It so happened that he could not be here until after the vote was taken, so his vote does not count. Our friend from New York [Mr. SNELL] is a great leader of the Republicans—he could not lead Democrats anywhere—but he is a great Republican leader. He had to be absent. He could not vote to stop salary increases. There was a time when the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] was the great economist of the Nation; he fought a man's fight against extravagance and waste and was for economy. He could not be here to-day. He could not vote to stop salary increases. And so we found Mr. ARENTZ, of Nevada, voting against economy, and he voted to permit salary increases. Then there was Doctor SUMMERS, of Washington. He did not vote in favor of economy. He voted for salary increases. And the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES], upon whom we have always expected a certain reliance to uphold the Government and back up the present effort to balance the Budget, he voted for salary increases. And Mr. DARROW, of Pennsylvania, the former great power on the Republican steering committee, he voted to permit salary increases in this terrible depression, when 7,000,000 heads of families are out of jobs.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; certainly, to my friend.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. The gentleman will recall that I made a strenuous fight here two or three weeks ago to try to save some of these needless expenditures, and got very little support at that time.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, yes.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I think that would be more important than the matter under consideration.

Mr. BLANTON. I am talking about to-day's action, where it was put right up to us, whether we would vote for economy in behalf of all the people or vote for salary raises and something more for the Government employees. Have we not been good to these employees? The people at home are just beginning to find out all Congress has done for these Government employees. They get 30 days' vacation every year on full pay. They get 30 days' additional sick leave on full pay, and most of them take it. They can get doctors' certificates, and they take it. That amounts to 60 days all together. Then they get all of the numerous Government holidays and they get a half holiday every Saturday. They get their salaries paid twice a month regularly. There is no doubt about their salaries. There is doubt about the income of the people at home, but the Government clerks are paid twice a month regularly. They get retirement privileges and are not dreading the future. They work seven hours a day. They have every kind of convenience and safeguard placed around them in the comfortable places where they work. We have been kind to them. We have not proposed to reduce them. We merely propose that they should not have a raise right now.

I have been checking on what the Classification Board did. An appropriation bill is going to be reported in here in a few days having to do with an activity where in one bureau of a department they took a bunch of employees and designated them heads of 19 divisions in one bureau. By doing that, 19 of them in one bureau automatically were raised from around $2,200 a year clerks to $5,600 to $7,500 heads of divisions. Think of it! And all of them were given automobiles, and some of them were given chauffeurs at Government expense to drive them. Are the people going to stand for that much longer? They are waking up. They know what is going on.

I called attention to the fact that down here in the Department of Commerce one of the most important bureaus is the Bureau of Domestic and Foreign Commerce. The man at the head of that bureau ought to know everything about the business of the Department of Commerce. Yet last July they took a man whose only connection with the Department of Commerce was back in 1924, when he was a $2,200 secretary, who had not had any experience with the Department of Commerce since, and put him in there at the head of this Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce at a salary of $9,000 a year. And he had to ask clerks all around him what it is all about. We are going to have to repeal that classification act. The people are not going to stand for this any longer, they are getting tired of it. Write your merchants back home, write your home clerks in banks, in stores, in offices, and ask them if they are satisfied with what the Government employees are getting, and they will tell you that they are getting too much consideration. When I vote to give Government employees more than the people are going to stand for I am not their friend, I am not doing them a kindness. I am doing them some harm, because the time will come when the people will decide they are getting too much, and the pendulum will swing back, and they will have taken away from them some of that to which they are justly entitled.

To my surprise, complaints have come to me in the last three weeks from numerous merchants here in Washington about the failure of Government employees to pay their accounts. Some of the finest people on God's earth are Government employees. I know many of them who have no peers anywhere. Ought a great body of honest, deserving Government employees to have their reputations damaged because certain Government employees will not pay their accounts? They have been sending me a list of the ones who will not pay anything they owe, and who defy these merchants, and tell the merchants to go and make a complaint to their chief, that he will not pay any attention to it; that he will tell them that the Government is not a collection agency. Of course, they will tell them it is a rule that if they do not pay they will be fired, but they do not pay any attention to that.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Post Office Department has been quite strict in enforcing that rule against rural mail carriers who do not pay their bills. Does the gentleman mean to say that it is not enforced here in Washington in the same way?

Mr. BLANTON. No; it is not. I hope the Washington newspapers will mention this. I have a bunch of complaints with the names and the addresses of the Government employees who buy indiscriminately and promiscuously and who get good salaries, and yet they will not pay their bills and defy the merchants.

It is not a disgrace for a person to refuse to pay a debt that he can not pay. But when a person with proper self-denial could pay what he owes, and refuses to pay, he is dishonest, and the Government ought to drop him.

Mr. FOSS. Why does not the gentleman put those names in the RECORD?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, not yet. I am going to give them a chance, and give them this notice, and if they do not make proper arrangements to pay what they owe to Washington merchants I am going to let the Congress know their names and addresses and what they owe and how long they have owed it, and take steps to have them dropped. And I will also take steps to have their chiefs dropped, who have been disregarding the regulations mentioned by my friend from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS], which require employees who willfully refuse to pay honest debts to be dropped from the Government service.

A person who with economy and self-denial could pay what he owes to merchants but who refuses to pay and has no concern about about paying is a deadbeat. No person working for this Government who is getting a good salary and who by economy and thrift can pay his bills has any business owing the merchants of Washington. If the newspapers will just call their attention to it, I am going to wait a while, as I am collecting a list of them, and if they do not arrange to pay up I intend to take some action to drop them from the service, and I am going to demand of the bureau chiefs that they obey the law and that they drop them from the list, if they do not pay their accounts. It is a disgrace to the Government of the United States to have deadbeats working in the departments.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly, because the gentleman always throws light on every subject.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I am a friend of the postal employee and have always stood by them, and the gentleman knows that what I am saying is a fact. The policy that our committee outlined is in the interest of the postal employees. The sooner those lobbyists who represent them around Washington find that out and quit this eternal drive on Congress, the better off the postal employees will be.

Mr. CABLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. CABLE. The gentleman from Texas is one of the greatest money savers this House has ever had. During the last few days of the Seventy-first Congress you saved millions of dollars of the people's money. The second best is the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. ARENTZ]; but I rise to ask this question: Does the gentleman from Texas not believe it is the duty of Members of Congress to attempt to conserve the taxpayers' money by cutting the salaries and expenses of the legislative body?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly, I do; and I will help the gentleman do it. We would not hesitate for a minute to vote that way.

Mr. BLACK. I would take about five minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. No. If the matter came to a vote, the gentleman from New York would do just like the gentleman from Nevada, Mr. ARENTZ, the gentleman from Montana, Mr. LEAVITT, the gentleman from New York, Mr. FISH, the gentleman from Washington, Doctor SUMMERS, the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. MAPES, and all these other gentlemen did this morning. He would vote right now.

Mr. BLACK. No. I promise the gentleman I will make a $10,000 masterpiece against it.

Mr. BLANTON. When there are men down here drawing salaries of from $15,000 to $50,000 a year and doing only a few hours' work per day occasionally for the Government, we will not save very much after we cut the salary of a Congressman. What the people want us to do is to cut all salaries above $3,000. Then we would save money and reduce expenses. But voting for the LaGuardia amendment this morning increases the salaries of certain employees.

We ought to reduce every appropriation bill that is brought in here and cut them to the bone.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself two additional minutes.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from New York, who is the only man who is ever able to put any spice in debate. I yield to him.

Mr. BLACK. Does not the gentleman realize that if it were not for prohibition we would not have to decrease any salaries?

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will listen in on the Columbia Broadcasting system to-night at 10 o'clock in its coast-to-coast hook-up, he will hear what I have to say about prohibition.

Mr. MILLARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly, I yield.

Mr. MILLARD. The gentleman has not mentioned the fact that the majority leader was not present this morning.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, he, with Mr. CRISP and Mr. SANDERS, and others, was working on the tax bill in the Committee on Ways and Means, doing the most valuable service that a man can do for his country, trying to balance the Budget.

Mr. MILLARD. But the gentleman admits that he was in the building. Is that right?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, he was in the Ways and Means Committee room, engrossed in the problem of raising revenue to balance the Budget.

Mr. MILLARD. I thank the gentleman very much.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. ABERNETHY].

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, as you know there was a very general onslaught to cut the salaries of postal employees, not only the salaries of the postal employees but the salaries of everybody else. Under the leadership of our matchless chairman we brought out a proposition that was fair to everybody, which met the situation and was generally satisfactory. I want to say it is to the eternal credit of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] that he stood up, as I stood up, against the onslaught on the Appropriations Committee's proposal. I have rendered a better service to the postal employees when I agreed with the leadership on both sides that we would have no increases in salaries and no promotions, which leaves the matter in a splendid position for the postal employees.

I want to suggest to the postal employees, and I am their sincere friend, the part of wisdom is for them to stand by the unanimous action of the Appropriations Committee. Is not that so, Mr. MICHENER?

Mr. MICHENER. Yes.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I have been requested by a representative of the Daughters of the American Revolution to seek to have included in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a recent, very able speech by Norman Sommerville, the distinguished Crown counsel of Canada, before the Women's Patriotic Conference at Washington, held on February 1, 1932, in which he gave a most interesting and instructive address on the prosecution of eight of the leading communists in Canada. I wrote him and asked if he would send me a copy of that address. I have looked it over and believe it to be a most valuable document which should be carefully read by Members of Congress, Federal and State officials, and the American public, being filled with many facts in regard to communist activities and propaganda in Canada which were not developed in the investigation of communism by the House committee. So with that explanation I ask unanimous consent that the speech made by Mr. Sommerville, Crown counsel of Canada, here in Washington last month, together with his letter of transmittal, be incorporated as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

NORMAN SOMMERVILLE & CO.,
Toronto, March 3, 1932.

MY DEAR MR. FISH: I have your letter of recent date asking for a copy of the address which I delivered at Washington. I am inclosing a copy of the same herewith.

You will be interested to know that since the address was delivered the court of appeals, by unanimous judgment, sustained the conviction of the eight communists. The chief justice wrote a very strong judgment, indicting the unlawful character of the Communist Party, and proving it from the documents which are admittedly the basis of communist activities in all countries. We are having several thousand copies of that portion of the judgment relating to the unlawful character and objects of the organization printed. They will be ready for distribution within the next day or so, and I shall take the liberty of forwarding a copy to you then.

I shall be interested to know if you succeeded in getting the address read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The effect of the judgment of the court of appeal is that mere membership in the Communist Party constitutes a crime and renders members liable to imprisonment for 20 years and to deportation. This very pregnant fact is now sinking into the membership in Canada, and we find a very great falling off in their activities.

In the meantime other proceedings are pending in several other Provinces, and the results will undoubtedly be the same as in the Province of Ontario.

I should be very glad to have any CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS containing the addresses which you have delivered to Congress in respect of this subject.

If there is any further information which I can give you in connection with this matter, I shall be very pleased to have you write me.

Wishing you every success in your splendid efforts for the orderly development of government in the United States, I am,

Yours very sincerely,

NORMAN SOMMERVILLE.

HAMILTON FISH, Jr.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C., U. S. A.

ADDRESS OF NORMAN SOMMERVILLE, K. C., OF TORONTO, ONTARIO, CANADA, BEFORE WOMEN'S PATRIOTIC CONFERENCE, WASHINGTON, D. C., FEBRUARY 1, 1932

Madam Chairman, distinguished guests, and friends, I say "friends" advisedly, for was there ever given to the world a more divine expression of friendliness than that which exists between your people and mine. It should always be so since our common differences are so superficial and our common interests so fundamental. We are, indeed, the joint keepers of the friendly frontier. That is America's greatest contribution to war-worn old Europe.

Looking at the program of the proposed activities of your conference one observes that there are to be many addresses delivered to you. Perhaps that little English lad was not far astray when he wrote upon an examination paper in answer to the question, "What is America?" "America is a land where they put people to death by elocution."

These are the days when there are many demands for addresses for banquets, service clubs, conventions, and associations. Out of these demands it was a real pleasure to accept your invitation to come to you, to address you in this Capital City. One summer I sojourned with my family in the north of Scotland. While motoring one afternoon up Glen Urquhart, away up the glen where it joins Glen Afric, we came upon an old Presbyterian kirk in the course of repair. We began to question the workmen about it, and we learned that this old kirk of the glen had fallen into such a terrible condition of disrepair that even the congregation became thoroughly ashamed of it. They decided that a collection should be taken up for the restoration of the kirk. The oldest member of the session, McTavish by name, was chosen to take the collection. He started out on Monday morning to cover the cottages in the glen, and he was coming down the mountain road on Tuesday afternoon. With his unsteady step he was taking the whole of the road. He came to a turn in the road and suddenly found himself face to face with his minister.

Straightening himself up as well as his condition would permit, he looked at the minister and the minister looked at him. Finally the minister sensed the situation and said, "McTavish, I'm afeerd you're the worse for liquor." "I am," said McTavish. "Weel, McTavish, do you not think it is a disgrace to be the worse for liquor when you are on the business of the congregation?" "No," said McTavish, "I blame it on the congregation." "Weel, how is that?" asked the minister. "You asked me to take a collection," said McTavish, "and every house I have visited has given me a wee drap, and I feel I ha' taken o'ermuch." The minister heatedly replied, "McTavish, that's a slander on my congregation to say that every home in my congregation has liquor in it." "Oh, no," said McTavish, "I didna' say that; there are some that have no got it. I'm not callin' on them. I'm writin' to them!"

And so, my friends, I am not writing to you. I'm calling on you.

I came to you so that we might discuss a matter of mutual interest—the common enemy that is in our midst, the Communist Party.

Canada believes that Soviet Russia is the common enemy of humanity; that the principles and practices of that nation would, if not curbed, destroy the finest achievements of mankind in the home, the church, and the state. Canada believes that the civilized nations of the world should treat Russia as it would any other outlaw. Russia could not survive a world aroused. Canada has used against this enemy the three weapons under her control—political, commercial, and judicial.

Politically our nation has refused to recognize or to hold political intercourse of any kind with the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics.

Through its control over trade and commerce, Canada has prohibited all commercial intercourse with Russia. We will not help to build up the trade of such an enemy to humanity. The temporary advantage seldom justifies the permanent injury. To strengthen such an enemy at this time is to invite a contest with a giant later.

The third weapon we used was that provided by the criminal code. Aroused by the increased activity of the past year, it was decided to have the Communist Party of Canada put on trial as an unlawful association.

For this purpose it was decided to proceed upon an act passed in Canada some years ago known as section 98 of the Criminal Code, which declares, in effect:

I. That any organization which "teaches, advocates, advises, or defends the use of force, violence, or physical injury for the purpose of bringing about governmental, industrial, or economic change" is an unlawful association.

II. That any person who is (i) a member or (ii) an officer of such an unlawful association is guilty of an offense and liable to 20 years' imprisonment.

This act provides a very simple method of proving membership, and membership in such an association now forms a ground for deportation from Canada.

Having completed all arrangements to proceed under this section, simultaneous raids and arrests took place at many points in Canada. The eight leaders of the party were brought to trial last November. Each of them was convicted and each was sentenced to five years' imprisonment. Communists believe in the 5-year plan—so do we, as a punishment. At the end of the five years each is to get his severest punishment, namely, deportation to the land of his origin. The verdict was a blow to communism throughout Canada. It was so recognized as a very severe blow to communism in other lands, since it was feared that this treatment might spread to other lands. A frantic appeal for help was made to Moscow. The following cable was sent to the International Red Aid in Berlin, Germany, through which Moscow communicates with the rest of the communist world, by the national executive committee of the Canadian Labour Defence League, a branch of the Communist Party:

[From The Worker, Saturday, November 21, 1931]

"Workers and farmers of Canada are faced with severe growing reaction. Communist Party outlawed, leaders jailed for five years, setting precedent for parliamentary countries. Workers of the world must help. Need $10,000 to carry on defense."

CANADIAN LABOUR DEFENCE LEAGUE.

An appeal was launched, apparently funds were provided, and during January the appeal was argued before the appellate division of the Supreme Court of Ontario. Judgment was reserved by the five judges hearing the appeal, but it is expected that judgment on the appeal will be delivered at the beginning of February.

[Judgment has since been delivered, on the 19th of February, 1932, dismissing the appeal and confirming the convictions. There being no further appeal from an unanimous judgment, the eight communists have been transported to Kingston Penitentiary to serve their terms.]

SOME SIGNIFICANT FACTS ABOUT THE TRIAL

I. The trial was by jury, practically chosen by the communists themselves. They challenged 80 jurors, and the jury finally selected consisted almost exclusively of workingmen, from whom the communists apparently hoped to get a favorable verdict. But labor, organized labor, has always been the greatest bulwark against the fallacious half truths of communism, and has steadfastly refused to adopt it. We hasten to acknowledge our gratitude to labor for its efforts on behalf of the state. Labor knows that communism means loss of liberty to every workingman. The verdict of the jury was the verdict of the workingman on the program of the communists, when properly explained to him.

II. The evidence on which the communist leaders were convicted was furnished entirely by the Communist Party itself. We did not rely on the flamboyant utterances of some enthusiast, nor seek a conviction on the speeches of some irreconcilable radical. Every material statement placed in evidence came from a document found in the possession of the accused, which was issued either by the Communist Party of Canada, at Toronto, or by the Communists International, at Moscow. Not a single document was disputed. Not a single quotation was denied. The evidence was therefore unassailable. Secret books, documents, and papers issued by Moscow are frequently declared to be forgeries when they are disclosed to the public. These documents, being found in the possession of the accused, could not be denied, but were, in fact, identified, and their contents indorsed by the very accused themselves. Unassailable evidence never before disclosed is therefore available to all who are interested in the program and tactics of the Communist Party throughout the world.

III. One of the most interesting sidelights of the trial was the disclosure of the activities of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Sergt. John Leopold, who had enlisted in that force for service overseas, was assigned for duty in Canada watching the activities of the International Workers of the World (I. W. W.), who at that time were spreading sedition among the foreign and radical elements in western Canada. While thus engaged, he was invited to join the Communist Party of Canada in 1921. For seven years he served as an officer in the Communist Party. He lived those seven long years in the shadows, while doing his duty to his country, in following the developments of communism in Canada. So well did he perform his duties that when he was sent to jail for assisting them in their demonstrations, he did not disclose his real identity. Indeed, so well did he discharge his duties as an officer of the Communist Party that, when after six years, he was accused on the floor of the national convention of being a representative of the government, he was defended so ably by his confrères that a vote of confidence was given to him, and he was elected assistant secretary to write the minutes of the whole convention. One year later he was betrayed by one whom he had befriended, and he was expelled from the party he had served so well. Such is gratitude! His devotion to duty, extremely tedious and difficult duty, for seven long years has added luster to the splendid traditions of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. "The mounties always get their man" is a saying that has a greater significance through the magnificent service of this cultured man who never ceased to be a gentleman. None will admit this more readily than his erstwhile comrades in communism.

IV. The trial was not an attack on freedom of speech, or liberty of action. Ours is a land of free institutions, freedom of speech, freedom of the press, and freedom of action to every man who will use these institutions, but not to those who abuse them. The abuse of freedom is lawlessness. Freedom demands that the rights of others be respected. Freedom of action is safeguarded so long as that freedom does not infringe on the rights of others. I am free to use that arm in all legitimate effort, but when I direct it to an assault on another it ceases to be freedom. It becomes a wrong. Freedom of speech is the proudest heritage of every Anglo-Saxon so long as that speech does not destroy the rights of others. There can be no freedom, however, where there is abuse of liberty or its privileges.

One of the fundamental rights of every individual is the right of self-preservation. In every legal system self-defense is acknowledged as the right of man. As with men so with the state. One of the fundamental obligations of every state is its duty to preserve itself against these attacks, as well from the traitor within its gates as from the enemy without its borders. It is the solemn duty of the state to prevent and suppress lawlessness and to punish those who abuse its liberty by acts or utterances that tend to corrupt public morals, incite to crime, or disturb the public peace. Teachings and practices which imperil the very state itself should not be permitted in any free land. It is entirely wrong, therefore, to say that when the overthrow of government by rebellion and civil war is being advocated the suppression of such practices is an attack upon liberty. When force or violence, in these days, takes the place of considered judgment and enlightened legislation then, indeed, "government of the people, by the people, and for the people" shall perish from the earth. The suppression of violence is not an attack upon but the very salvation of liberty.

WHAT THE TRIAL DISCLOSED

The trial disclosed that in the year 1919 three men arrived in America to organize Communist Parties in Canada, the United States, and Mexico. These men were all foreigners; one was Katayama, a Jap, still an active member of the Præsidium, in Moscow; the second was a man named Jensen, from Latvia. He later adopted the name of Scott, and was assigned to work in Canada. The third man was named Freina, and was from Russia.

These men came with a Russian mandate to establish Communist Parties in America. They had a Russian program, and they brought with them Russian gold to the extent of $60,000. A second installment of $30,000 was intrusted to a courier for delivery to them, but the courier and the money disappeared in Mexico. They constituted the Pan American council. This was Moscow's first mission to America. Never before in history had one nation deliberately sent out its emissaries to bring about civil war and revolution in another great nation. We believe that was an act of war as deliberate as if they had openly fired upon our flag. Russia has persisted in her war upon other lands ever since by these same methods, so that to-day in 57 countries of the world great parties have been established who owe allegiance to Russia rather than to their native lands and who deliberately plan the forcible overthrow of their own governments.

The party was formed in Canada in May, 1921, under the direction of Scott, one of the trio direct from Moscow. Because of its revolutionary objects, it was created as an illegal or underground organization. The first issue of The Communist, the official organ of the party, in June, 1921, contains some very illuminating statements as to the origin, objects, and tactics of the party in Canada. You will observe that it adopts the program of the Communist Party of the United States with slight variations, and you get from these quotations a fair estimate of the aims and objects of the Communist Party of the United States. It remained underground until 1924 and made little progress while working illegally. In 1924, on orders from Moscow, it came aboveground.

These are extracts from the report of the constituent convention of the Communist Party of Canada, May, 1921.

"In accordance with the mandate of the Pan American council, the Third International, to bring about the formation of the Communist Party of Canada, the United Communist Party and other Canadian groups met in constituent convention to take the first steps in the preparation of the proletariat in this country for the realization of its dictatorship. The place and fashion of meeting, underground and illegal in themselves, denote the great change that the imperialist way and the Russian revolution have wrought in the conditions in the class struggle, even in backward Canada. 'Rat hole,' as that law-abiding old spinster, the S. L. P., would sneer, but extremely efficient under the changed circumstances, nevertheless. The convention was called to order by a representative of the Pan American council, who acted as chairman."

"The program submitted was, with certain eliminations of specifically American matter and certain additions to apply to the Canadian situation, that of the Communist Party of America. It was an excellent document, largely written by Marx, Lenin, Zinoviev, and Radek, a neat digest of the theses of the second congress and the manifesto of the first.

"Then follows the formal acceptance of the 21 conditions for admission to the Communist International.

"The result of the constituent convention is the organization of the vanguard of the Canadian working class into the Communist Party of Canada. Section of the communist international with a program of mass action as the vital form of proletarian activity, armed insurrection, civil war as the decisive, final form of mass action for the destruction of the capitalist state, proletarian dictatorship in the form of soviet power as the lever of the communist reconstruction of society. And now, comrades, there is tremendous work before us."

"The revolutionary epoch upon which we have now entered forces upon the proletariat the application of militant methods, namely, mass action, which leads to direct collision with the bourgeois state, developing into armed insurrection and civil war."

Mass action consists of mass demonstrations and mass strikes.

"As these strikes grow in number and intensity they acquire political character by coming into collision and open combat with the capitalist state which openly employs all its machinery to break the strikes and crush the workers' organizations. This culminates in armed insurrection and civil war aimed directly at the destruction of the capitalist state and the establishment of the proletarian dictatorship."

"The successful establishment of the Soviet Republics led by the Russian Soviet Republic is an inspiration to the proletarians of the world to rise and destroy the dictatorship of the bourgeoisie of the world.

"The Communist Party of Canada, Section of the Third International, assembled in its constituent convention in May, 1921, indorses and adopts unanimously on roll-call vote the 21 points for affiliation with the Communist International as binding upon all delegates present and for its entire membership without any reservations."

"SEC. 2. It is the organization of the revolutionary vanguard of the proletariat. Its purpose is to educate, direct, and lead the working class of Canada for the conquest of political power, to destroy the bourgeois state machinery, to establish the dictatorship of the proletariat in the form of soviet power, to abolish the capitalist system, and to introduce the communist society.

"SEC. 1. Every person who accepts the principles and tactics of the Communist Party of Canada and the Communist International, who submits to the party discipline and agrees to engage actively in the party work, shall be eligible to membership."

This was the party's charter. By it must the party be judged. It can not complain of its own declarations.

The name chosen was the Communist Party of Canada, Section of Communist International. It was not an independent party with aims and objects suited only to the needs of Canada, but it was a section of Communist International, part and parcel of the whole.

You will observe that it had a Russian chairman, Russian money, Russian mandate, Russian program, with a truly Russian conception. It was born out of the Russian revolution; it carried the very breath of revolution in it. It was not a mere historical conception of revolution but a present actuality. It was the reflection of the experience through which Russia had passed and a statement of the means by which Canada must follow in Russia's footsteps.

Every Communist Party must adopt the same program in every country, otherwise it will not be accepted by communist international.

The statutes and theses of the communist international are binding upon every single member of the Communist Party throughout the world. The evidence disclosed that the parties in Canada and the United States accepted fully the theses and statutes of the second congress as the basis of their activity. These statutes have already been judicially considered by the courts of appeal in two of the Provinces of Canada, and it has been unanimously adjudged in each that the statements and principles declared and advocated in these states are extremely seditious according to the common law, which is at the foundation of the jurisprudence of North America. They would doubtless be equally seditious according to your common law.

You will observe from the charter from which I have quoted that the Communist Party is determined to establish "the dictatorship of the proletariat." Now, what does that mean? Well, proletariat means "wage earner who has no property." The bourgeoisie are all the rest of the people. It is, then, the dictatorship of the propertyless over all the rest of the people.

Let us look at the Moscow documents as to the nature of this dictatorship.

"The conquest of power by the proletariat does not mean peacefully 'capturing' the ready-made bourgeois state machinery by means of a parliamentary majority. * * * The conquest of power by the proletariat is the violent overthrow of bourgeois power, the destruction of the capitalist state apparatus (bourgeois armies, police, bureaucractic hierarchy, the judiciary, parliaments, etc.) and substituting in its place new organs of proletarian power to serve primarily as instruments for the suppression of the exploiters."

[From page 659 of evidence Exhibit 103, theses and statutes of Communist International as adopted at the Second World Congress, July 17, to August 7, 1920]

"Only a violent defeat of the bourgeois, the confiscation of his property, the annihilation of the entire bourgeois government apparatus, from top to bottom, parliamentary, juridical, military, bureaucratic, administrative, municipal, etc., up to the individual exile or interment of the most stubborn and dangerous exploiters, the establishment of a strict control over them for the repressing of all inevitable attempts at resistance and restoration of capitalistic slavery—only such measures will be able to guarantee the complete submission of the whole class of exploiters."

"Therefore, the preparation of the dictatorship of the proletariat must be begun immediately and in all places by means of the following method, among others (Nuclei, etc.)."

"But the overthrow of capitalism is impossible without force, without armed uprising, and proletarian wars against the bourgeoisie."

[From page 230 of evidence, Exhibit 43, syllabus of course of study of Marxism and Leninism, under cover of letter N/7804/10, sent from Moscow, 1927, "To the Agitprop department of all parties"]

"Smashing the bourgeois state: The proletariat can not simply take over the bourgeois state machine, and get it going for its own purpose. It must destroy it to its foundation and build up its own state machine."

[From pages 666 and 667 of evidence, Exhibit 103, theses and statutes of Communist International as adopted at the Second World Congress, July 17 to August 7, 1920]

"The working class can not achieve the victory over the bourgeoisie by means of the general strike alone, and by the policy of folded arms. The proletariat must resort to an armed uprising. Having understood this, one realizes that an organized political party is absolutely essential, and that shapeless labor organizations will not suffice. The revolutionary syndicalists frequently advance the idea of the great importance of a determined revolutionary minority. The Communist Party is just such a determined minority of the working class, which is ready to act, which has a program, and strives to organize the masses for the struggle."

"The proletariat realize their dictatorship through the conquest of the power of the state. But what is meant by the 'conquest of the power of the state?' Many people believe that it is a very simple thing to deprive the bourgeoisie of power. This view is quite erroneous, and a little consideration will enable us to ascertain where the error lies."

"When the proletariat fight to acquire power, against what do they fight? Against the bourgeois organization in the first place. When they fight this organization their problem consists in finding that part of their enemy's defenses where their blows will take most effect. But as the chief power of the state lies in the army, it is necessary, above all things, to undermine and destroy the army in order to overcome the bourgeoisie. * * * As long as the army of your opponent is intact, the revolution can not succeed. When the revolution conquers, the army of the bourgeoisie falls to pieces. * * * The army which marches against the workers at the order of the generals of the bourgeoisie must be destroyed, even if the last of our countrymen are killed in the process. The revolution means death to them in any case. We have therefore nothing to fear from the destruction of the bourgeois army; and a revolutionary must account it a gain to have destroyed the state apparatus of the bourgeoisie. Where the bourgeois discipline is sound the bourgeoisie are invincible. Those who really want to overthrow the bourgeoisie must not shrink from inflicting a little pain."

"The Russian revolution has taught the working class militants of the world, and we are proud to accept the leadership of the Bolsheviks. Bolshevism has taught us what the conquest of power is like, has taught us how to link up the struggles of the eastern peoples with those of the western proletariat, how to unite the farmers with the workers against the common capitalist enemy, how to work out the economic policy of socialism, how to fight bureaucracy, and build the soviet state. They have taught us that the class struggle is civil war and that the only real workers' government is the Soviet Government. They have taught us Leninism—that, in the words of the great leader, 'We want not hysterical outbursts but the regular march of the iron battalions of the proletariat.'"

Such is their own definition of the dictatorship which communists are striving to establish in our land in our day. There is not a word of liberty in it for anyone. Not even for the dictators, the workers themselves. In all the documents seized there is not a word of liberty for anyone. It is all domination, discipline, cruel and ruthless destruction. These things shall not be in this free democracy of the west.

This month we celebrate with you the birth of one of the great characters of all history. That Virginian gentleman who, filled with a Briton's love of freedom, defied a German king, upon England's throne, because he was a dictator, has declared that for all time men here shall be free. That declaration is our heritage, too. This Nation, born out of a dictatorship, if true to itself, will always defy the dictator. For us there shall be no dictator, neither of the rich nor of the poor, the bourgeoisie or the proletariat, but all shall be free to assist in developing and expanding that liberty for which our fathers and our brothers have fought.

But still some people will say, "Russia may have a revolution, but you can never have such violence in an enlightened country like the United States of America."

Well, let us see what the communists teach about that. They ought to know—they are experienced in violence and the creators of strife.

Into the hands of every proposed member of communism is put a handbook called "The A B C of Communism." It is said to contain the minimum of political knowledge required of each member respecting the Communist Party. It is written by Bukharin, one of the ablest leaders in Moscow. Listen to what it says:

"Many people believe that the horrors of civil war are the results of the 'Asiatic' outlook and the backwardness of the Russian people. The enemies of the revolution in western Europe continually assert that 'Asiatic' socialism flourishes in Russia, and that the revolution will be consummated in other countries without violence. That is nonsense. In a capitalistically developed country, the resistance of the bourgeoisie must be stronger than in an undeveloped one. The intellectuals (technical experts, engineers, officers, etc.) are more closely bound to capital, and therefore more antagonistic to communism. The civil war in such a country must, therefore, be more violent than in Russia. We have ample evidence of this in the case of Germany. The German revolution has shown that the struggle in an advanced capitalistic country assumed a very violent form."

This dictatorship of the proletariat is to be brought about through what they call "mass action."

The Communist Party, according to orders from Moscow, must do everything.

"To secure the leadership of mass actions (strikes, unemployment movements, demonstrations, etc.), actions which often break spontaneously and lead these actions along the channels of organized political struggle, especially in the form of mass political strikes, which will bring the working class toward the task of revolutionary struggle for power."

The Communist Party is seeking this leadership in three principal fields of activity: (i) In the trade-union movement; (ii) in the farmers' movement; (iii) in the foreign-language groups.

I. IN THE TRADE-UNION MOVEMENT

The evidence disclosed that the Communist Party organized and absolutely controls the Workers' Unity League. This is the industrial depot of the Communist Party of Canada. Through the Workers' Unity League it was disclosed that the Communist Party controls unions in Canada having a membership of over 25,000 men, comprising mostly mine workers, lumber workers, steel workers, and the needle trades; that in every one of these unions a strike has been called and in every case bloodshed had ensued. The party does not believe in reform. There can be no reform satisfactory to them. There can only be revolution. As Moscow writes:

"The assertion that the party must consider 'revolutionary reforms' as its task is quite incorrect. There can be no talk of revolutionary reforms. We can only speak for the struggle for the revolution."

Hence the party does not lead the unions to seek reforms in their conditions. They only use these organizations as a means of stirring up revolutionary sentiment. As the program of Communist International says, at page 79 (Exhibit 68):

"The task of the party is to utilize these minor everyday needs as a starting point from which to lead the working class to the revolutionary struggle for power.

"When the revolutionary tide is rising, when the ruling classes are disorganized, the masses are in a state of revolutionary ferment, the intermediary strata are inclined toward the proletariat, and the masses are ready for action and for sacrifice, the party of the proletariat is confronted with the task of leading the masses to a direct attack upon the bourgeois state. This it does by carrying on propaganda in favor of increasingly radical transitional slogans."

If there are no grievances among the working classes, then it is the duty of the party to develop grievances so as to create a revolutionary upsurge.

One very illuminating document found in possession of the leader in Canada, a man by the name of Tim Buck, was a copy of the speech which he delivered to the executive committee in Moscow, in which he said:

"The political line of our party is to utilize this tendency of radicalization by adopting a policy of developing demands and initiating movements in different industries. All the characteristics of the third period are manifested to-day quite sharply. On account of the position of the Canadian working class, it is necessary to develop demands in advance rather than wait for sporadic outbreaks. Spontaneous strikes do not generally assume the proportions or the possibilities that the spontaneous strikes in the United States do because of the differences in the size of the centers and industrial concerns. The political value of these strikes therefore tends to be less unless we ourselves can prepare them in certain industries. The result is that we have adopted a policy of developing demands in many industries, and on this basis sharpening relations and developing strike movements."

The industrial work of the party is essentially to provoke the innocent workers into rebellion and civil strife under the leadership of these agitators.

II. IN THE FARMERS' MOVEMENT

The Communist Party of Canada received orders in August, 1930, to organize at once the farmers in Canada in what was to be called "The Farmers' Unity League." The program which was to entice the farmers was supplied by Moscow. Similar agrarian policies were provided for all other countries.

[From pages 335–336 of evidence, Exhibit 81, letter from Krestintern, at Moscow, to Tim Buck]

"Starting with the partial needs, the Communist Party must sharpen the slogans and the methods of struggle in accordance with the revolutionary situation and always link them up with the slogans of the confiscation of the land of big landowners, the overthrow of the bourgeois government by an armed rebellion, and the establishment of a workers' and farmers' government (the dictatorship of the proletariat).

"As to the method of struggle for these demands, they must lead to the revolutionizing of the masses. Decisive statements and agitation by communists in favor of these demands must be calculated to mobilize the masses for the direct struggle for the fundamental tasks of the Communist Party. They must also be supported by the mass activity of the farmers. It is necessary to utilize all forms of struggle of the farmers' meetings, gatherings, demonstrations of protest, etc. The organization of a struggle against the collection of taxes, debts, fines, and, under conditions of a revolutionary upsurge, to the point of a boycott or mass refusals to pay taxes and assessments. Refusal to do forced labor for the government, the local government, etc. Mass refusals to pay rent, the owners' share (in share cropping), etc. Mass refusal to pay debts to the government, money lenders, landowners, and bankers. The organization of resistance to tax collectors, to the forced collection of debts, rents, etc. The organization of the resistance to evictions of farmers from the land. The seizure of the land of the government and the big landowners. Demonstrations of solidarity and support of strikes of agricultural workers, miners, road workers, etc., and participation in the 1st of May and other demonstrations. General meetings and demonstrations with the workers against the war danger and fascism. Participation in the demonstrations in front of courts and prisons. Participation in the organization of help for the victims of the white terror and political prisoners. The organization of self-defense by the working farmers. Mass resistance to the arrest of prominent revolutionary farmers. Mass demonstrations against war and in defense of the Union Socialist Republic. The organization of farmers' delegations to the Soviet Union, etc."

Upon this program the Communist Party of Canada called four conferences in September, 1930, and in one month signed up 5,000 farmers to the support of the Communist Party of Canada. This is truly a remarkable achievement, which was made possible by the unfortunate conditions existing among our farmers. It illustrates the dangers that exist when the economic conditions bear so heavily upon the workers and the farmers of the land.

In this connection an interesting letter produced in evidence gave unmistakable evidence that parties sent to Russia are accompanied by well-seasoned guides who know what to show the tourist, and to explain properly what they see. As a result of the success among the farmers, it was decided to send a delegation of farmers to Moscow:

"We have selected Comrade Navis as leader of the delegation because of the importance of the delegation and because there are several important matters to be taken with different institutions in Union of Social Soviet Republics. The names of several were considered, and finally all agreed that John must go. He was abroad and knows the ways to go by. He can talk to the delegates on their way to Union of Social Soviet Republics and prepare them psychologically for the visit. He can give them the proper interpretation of everything they will see there. We want the delegates to come back with a unanimous opinion about the achivements in Union of Social Soviet Republics, and utilize their experiences for propaganda purposes. They are required upon their return to give some of their time (at least two months) for traveling and reporting to the mass meetings. And we don't take any changes. That is why we had to unanimously agree to let John go with the delegation."

III. ORGANIZATION OF FOREIGN-LANGUAGE GROUPS

The greatest success of the Communist Party of Canada has been in getting control of the foreign-language groups throughout the land. The party controls, absolutely and completely, the Ukrainian Farm Labor Temple Association, the most important among the 400,000 Ukrainians in Canada. This organization has about 150 lodges, over 50 temples, several newspapers, and owns property valued at about $1,000,000. It is a powerful organization. So complete is this control exercised by the Communist Party of Canada that the minority of the executive committee of the Ukrainian Farm Labor Temple Association appealed to Moscow against the severity of this control, but without success. The appeal, however, discloses that when some Ukrainian school children took part in a tree-planting ceremony the local Ukrainian lodge was reported to Moscow for further discipline. Also when the Ukrainian orchestra played our national anthem at the opening of a public concert or when the prime minister of a Province was allowed to speak in one of their halls, in both instances the local Communist Party reported the Ukrainian organization to Moscow, in order that it might be disciplined for these crimes against communist principles.

The appeal also disclosed that the Ukrainian lodges had adopted in its entirety the communist program and that large numbers of Ukrainian children had been taken out of school and were being taught in Ukrainian temples doctrines that were wholly anti-capitalistic and deeply antireligious. The whole conception of our government and its institutions was being given to these youthful minds by the communists, and they were being poisoned in their whole outlook on our civilization. Thus does the nursery of communism flourish in our midst.

THE FINNISH ORDER

So completely is the Finnish population under the domination of the Communist Party, according to our evidence, that until recently no one could become a member of the Finnish order without at the same time joining the Communist Party of Canada. This is the most influential organization among the Finns. It has upwards of 100 lodges, property worth several hundred thousands of dollars, and exercises a powerful influence among the Finns in Canada. The Communist Party of Canada appoints the editor of the Finnish paper and controls its policy to the last detail. Recently Moscow ordered that all Finns were not to be accepted as communists; that they did not want members recruited in this manner. They did not want large numbers so much as disciplined members. They wanted men who would obey; a small disciplined group to lead the unthinking masses is their ideal.

What is true of the Ukrainian and Finnish population is equally true of the Hungarians, Serbs, Bulgarians, Rumanians, and some German and Hebrew organizations.

While we strive to assimilate the foreigner, they seek to isolate him; while we try to make them citizens, they would make them traitors. We seek peace; they teach civil strife. In a land that offers free opportunity to the oppressed of the world we will not allow the seeds of sedition to be sown. We are determined not to garner a harvest of hatred and strife.

THE MOSCOW CONTROL

Moscow controls every activity of the Communist Party everywhere. It especially governs the affairs of America and has set up in Moscow a special committee known as the Anglo-American Secretariat whose duty it is to keep constantly spurring on the membership here and in Canada to realize now—in these days of economic depression—the proletarian revolution, not as a distant hope but as a present possibility.

No better example of Moscow's discipline can be cited than the case of Jack MacDonald. For 10 years he was the leader of the party in Canada. From the days of its origin he worked zealously in the interests of the cause and regularly visited Russia to gain fresh knowledge and inspiration. He suffered for the cause, went to gaol, and was looked upon by the communists in Canada as their martyr. When, in 1930, Moscow demanded that he at once begin to realize the revolution he hesitated with the suggestion that the time was not ripe for such drastic steps as were suggested. Moscow does not reason with you. It just issued an ultimatum in this form:

"Moscow.

"Tim Buck, central committee Communist Party of Canada, November 22, 1930.

"Place before MacDonald demand that he, as member of party and C. C. must openly admit and immediately abandon right opportunist position, unconditionally agrees to carry on resolute struggle in deed against all right elements in party, against Lovestoneites as well as Trotzkyites, unconditionally accepts Communists International and party line and discipline, informing him failing to accept these conditions of the Tenth Executive Council of Communist International Plenum means expulsion from the party. In case he does not comply with this demand C. C. should take action publishing statement of his position.

"HECKERT."

MacDonald did not accept within 10 days, and he who had served his party so faithfully was summarily expelled as a traitor to the cause. His only crime was that he was not bloodthirsty enough for Moscow, which decided as follows:

"There is no room in the Communist Party for elements who deny the revolutionary class significance of the present period and the revolutionary conclusions which flow from it, or who evade the revolutionary duties and tasks which these conclusions involve. We live in the period of war colonial revolt and proletarian revolution. Our party is the party of the proletarian revolution. In this present deep and sharpening crisis of world capitalism, with its concurrent sharpenings of the class struggle, every member of our party must be a fighter and a leader of the working class. The cleansing of our party of all elements who resist this is our stern duty to the Communist International and the working class."

Tim Buck, fiery fighter of Moscow's choice, became the new leader. The party enlisted upon a new era of great revolutionary activities. Hence the prosecution and outlawry of the party.

One of the most extraordinary documents found in the party's possession was the Vassiliev pamphlet, written by one Vassiliev, a prominent member of the organization department at Moscow. This document was distributed by the Communist Party of the United States, and it was through this office that it reached Canada. It is a guide to present-day activities of the Communist Party. Written in 1930, it is Moscow's latest message in tactics. It deals at great length and in detail with the methods for the illegal work of the party everywhere; gives directions as to secret codes, invisible inks, secret hiding places, secret messages, and constitutes in fact the whole machinery of an illegal society.

It urges the establishment of labor defense corps, a group of workers trained to prevent by means of violence any interference by the police. The accused admitted such defense corps existed in Canada. The pamphlet then proceeds as follows:

"In many cases the comrades from the proletarian self-defense units defended themselves with stones. But again here is evidence from those who were present at these operations showing that our comrades don't know how to throw stones. It is not enough to pick up a stone and throw it, but it is important that the stone should hit its target, and not merely hit its target, but that some effect should be seen from that blow. But so long as our comrades don't go through any training in throwing stones, they naturally throw stones more for the moral effect. But if meanwhile members of proletarian self-defense organizations systematically train themselves in throwing stones, and set themselves the aim, let us say, of each evening, when they finish work, and each morning, instead of going through gymnastic exercises, throwing stones at a target 25 paces away, we can say beforehand that in two weeks the results of such a training on any attack would be quite different."

The evidence disclosed that there was stone throwing at the demonstration in Toronto on May 1 last, and in the office of the secretary was found this carbon copy of a letter dated May 2, 1931:

[From page 326 of evidence, Exhibit 76, letter addressed to Jeanne Corbin, district 2, Montreal, Province of Quebec, May 2, 1931]

"The demonstration in Toronto yesterday (I did not attend) was good. Two arrests with charges, the others were released. Four police were beaten up and one had to go to the hospital, so you see that things are picking up."

People who preach such doctrines and practice such methods should be prosecuted. They are beyond the law. They have so constituted themselves. They are outlaws. Why not treat them as such everywhere—right now? Better stamp out the incipient blaze, lest the conflagration destroy you.

Let us, by all the means in our power, repress these enemies within our gates. But let us also be constructive. Let us be alert to remedy the weaknesses in our democratic system of government. Let us demonstrate our ability to adapt our institutions to the social problems of our day. But let the genius of the race prove its sterling qualities by producing these results through the orderly process of legislation. Revolution shall not pass this way. But that declaration requires of us courage, determination, and wisdom.

It would seem at this time as if Columbia, the spirit of this Nation, were calling to her children:

"Give me men to match my mountains.
Give me men to match my plains.
Men of courage, men of action,
Men of purpose, men of brains."

Give me the men and the women of this fair land who have ideals as lofty and as pure as yonder mountain peaks; give me the men and the women who have sympathies for all human need, as broad and rich as yonder golden prairies; give me the men and the women who have character and courage as firm and abiding as the rocks I possess, and I shall give you the men and the women who will, in God's name, make this Nation worthy of the leadership of the world.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS].

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I have a poll conducted by the Des Moines Register, of Des Moines, Iowa, of February 26, 1932, on cutting the expenses of the Army and the Navy. It indicates the way people generally feel about ever-mounting armament expenditures. I ask unanimous consent that the poll be incorporated in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GLOVER]. [Applause.]

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, we have had a discussion this afternoon about many things, but I want to talk to you about something that has not been talked about so far as I know, and I think is very vital to the taxpayers of America.

We are told in the press to-day that the Democratic Party is sponsoring a sales bill that will be reported out next week. If that be true, I want to register my protest now against it.

I have tried to maintain a reputation in this House for economy. I have voted for it on every occasion so far as I know.

When the moratorium came up for $252,000,000 to be given to the foreigners, I thought that ought to be paid into the Treasury of the United States. I think so now and I think every man who voted for that believes that was bad policy on the part of this Government, to vote for that and then go out and put a sales tax on our people. You can not explain that position to the satisfaction of your people.

The next mistake that came up was going into the United States Treasury, when you say you have no money, and vote for a $2,000,000,000 corporation bill, and at one scoop of the hand take out $500,000,000 in money, and then talk about placing a sales tax that will reach every poor man in the land. I say to you that is a poor policy. We are told we have a $2,000,000,000 deficit, or will have, that must be met. Who is the man at the head of that who is now trying to balance it? It is your Treasurer of your party, appointed by your President, and I presume he voices the sentiment of the President of the United States when he favors that kind of a proposition.

To my mind, gentlemen, it is nonsensical in this time of distress, when people can not now pay the tax burden that is laid upon them—it is the height of foolishness to go out now and place an additional burden upon them in an attempt to raise in this time of distress $2,000,000,000 and put it on the backs of our constituents in an attempt to raise this amount in taxes by 1933. The sensible thing to do, and the thing that any business man that had a deficit of this kind would do in a distressful time like this, would be to amortize it and pass it out farther into the future when times are better and when it can be met.

I do not agree with your Secretary of the Treasury or with the Ways and Means Committee that we ought to attempt now to pass a bill next week to lay this burden on the backs of our folks to raise $2,000,000,000 in so short a time as is proposed in the bill.

I am going to propose a proposition to relieve the $2,000,000,000 deficit in two bills which I have introduced and that I rose to call to your attention. One of them I introduced to-day, which will solve this question and will never take a dollar out of the pockets of the people and not a cent of burden in taxes will be laid upon them, and it will not be a tax on liquor either. It will be a fundamental proposition that is authorized and warranted by the Constitution of the United States and Congress only can exercise this power.

I introduced one bill last week which is known as H. R. 9589, to amend the revenue laws of the United States and to provide for the collection of income tax on capital invested in foreign countries. If you will place a tax on American capital owned by American citizens living in the United States and having their capital invested in foreign countries, under my bill it will bring $50,000,000 of revenue to your Treasury every year. It will not touch a dollar's worth of property in the United States, but it will tax some property outside the United States that ought to be taxed in the United States. Not only this but it will have a twofold purpose. It will stop the investment of capital in foreign countries and bring it back home where it ought to be, and instead of giving labor to those of a foreign government and to a foreign people the labor will be given to our American citizens, where it ought to be given. If the American flag is not good enough for an American citizen to live under and invest his capital under, then let him go to some foreign flag that he likes better.

The bill that I introduced to-day is one that I believe will appeal to you. I have confidence in this House, and I believe that when the tax bill comes up next week, laying its burden of tax on every home in the United States, that this House is not going to vote for it, or at least a majority of them.

We have a great deficit during this administration, that is true, and we ought to meet it like sensible men. We ought to meet it with a proposition that is warranted by the Constitution of the United States.

I have introduced a bill to-day as an emergency measure, and I am offering it to the Ways and Means Committee in good faith as a substitute for the bill they have been working on so long. If they will take my two bills as a substitute, it will balance the Treasury of the United States in a very short time and give us a surplus of money.

Here is the bill, and it is the medicine that will hit the spot. The bill is short, and I would like to read it to you. It is a fresh, new one, just put in the basket to-day. The bill is to provide for the limited coinage of $2,000,000,000 in silver and to regulate the value thereof.

A bill to provide for the limited coinage of $2,000,000,000 in silver and to regulate the value thereof

Whereas the Constitution of the United States provides that Congress is given the authority and power "To coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures"; and

Whereas there is now facing the United States Treasury a deficit of $2,000,000,000, which must be raised by taxes or otherwise; and

Whereas there is now in the Treasury of the United States $499,313,006 in silver, which amount is wholly insufficient to meet the needs and requirements of the business world: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to immediately have coined $1,000,000,000 in silver money and of the denomination and weight of the present silver coinage; and the Secretary of the Treasury is further authorized and directed to have issued $1,000,000,000 in silver certificates of the denomination and kind now used in the United States Government; and said coined silver money and said silver certificates shall be good and valid money of the United States and shall be accepted at full face value in the payment of all public and private debts and in business transactions the same as if it were gold coin or gold certificates.

Now, that is authorized by the Constitution. Where is the common sense in the Ways and Means Committee putting a tax on the already tax-burdened people, burdened to a point that they can not pay the tax assessments they now have? Now, you come and put on a burden of taxes on the people, and you are not going to get as much revenue as you got without it. Why? Because you are going to paralyze business. Business is not greeneyed. When you tax a man who can not make a profit, you do not gain anything. You talk about hiding away 60 per cent of the money; you will drive all of it out when you paralyze business.

What we need is an expansion of the currency. Who doubts the authority for putting this in direct execution, and who doubts that it would be of great advantage to the people of the United States? No one can dispute it; we have a right to do it. As the gentleman said down there to-day, the fellows back home are talking and asking, Why do not you exercise the right given under the Constitution of the United States instead of coming out with a bill for a further burden of taxation?

Gentlemen, it is not right; it is suicidal to further burden the people with $2,000,000,000 more in taxes that must be raised by 1933 in order to balance the Budget in a time of distress.

Not only that, we need the silver money in circulation. How long has it been since you have seen a gold coin? It is like a balloon, you only see one every year or two. Gold hides away; all we have now is hiden away. I am not against the gold standard, I believe in a double standard, but the trouble with us now is that you are on a single standard, where they can hoard it and paralyze business as they have done.

But you come back and say this trouble is world-wide. I deny that part of it anyway. In our country, that great financier in control of our finances brought it on to the detriment of this Nation. Are we big enough to see the situation, are we big enough to exercise the right given under the Constitution and take ourselves out of this difficulty, under our rights, without laying the whip and burden of taxation upon our people back home? That is my complaint. Go and speak to somebody on the Ways and Means Committee and make a complaint as I have done, and he will say to you, What have you to offer? I have something better than a sales tax. I can offer a dozen things that will beat that. I think when that plan comes out and you study it, and you have studied this plan as a solution, you will see that the gentleman from Arkansas is right. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that their is no quorum present.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SWANK, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 10022 and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to—

Mr. GILBERT, indefinitely, on account of business.

Mr. SOMERS of New York, indefinitely, on account of illness of his wife.

Mr. LAMBETH, indefinitely, on account of illness.

Mr. MURPHY, for the day, on account of illness.

Mr. MAY, on account of important business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WOODRUM. What is the order of business for Monday?

The SPEAKER. The Consent Calendar.

Mr. WOODRUM. Can the Chair give any information as to whether the entire day will be utilized with the Consent Calendar?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so. The calendar is quite long.

Mr. WOODRUM. Then, under the present order of business, as I understand it—and I am asking this information for the committee—Monday is consent day, Tuesday will be taken up with the anti-injunction bill, and Wednesday is Calendar Wednesday business, so that the next call for this committee would be Thursday.

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to an enrolled joint resolution of the Senate of the following title:

FINAL RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE WAR POLICIES COMMISSION

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with the provisions of Public Resolution No. 98, approved June 27, 1930, creating the War Policies Commission, and Public Resolution No. 2, approved December 21, 1931, extending the time for the submission of its recommendation, I transmit herewith the final recommendations of the commission.

HERBERT HOOVER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 7, 1932.

[NOTE.—Report accompanied similar message to the House of Representatives.]

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I want to suggest two courses of action supplementary to the message of the President and the report of the War Policies Commission, which have been transmitted by the President to the Senate pursuant to act of Congress.

This is a report of the so-called War Policies Commission, which was created by act of Congress one year ago for the purpose of recommending a practical formula to take the profits out of war and to equalize the burdens of war, if, unhappily, this scourge again comes to America. It was a mixed commission, consisting of members of the Cabinet, Members of the House, and Members of the Senate, under the chairmanship of the Secretary of War. The Senate was represented by the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], and myself. The report is now transmitted to Congress. Its summary is exceedingly brief, and the first request I want to submit is that this illuminating and self-explanatory summary shall be printed in the RECORD, if it is not otherwise printed in the RECORD in the House proceedings. I want Congress and the country to sense the tremendous import of this prospectus in practical patriotism.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made.

The report of the commission is as follows:

WAR POLICIES COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., March 5, 1932.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I inclose herewith the final recommendations of the commission created by a congressional resolution entitled "Joint resolution to promote peace and to equalize the burdens and to minimize the profits of war."

Twelve of the fourteen members of the commission have signed these recommendations. Of the two members not signing, one is attending the disarmament conference in Geneva and the other has prepared a minority report, which is attached hereto.

On December 4, 1931, there was submitted to the President a preliminary report concerning the commission's activities. An extension of time for the preparation of conclusions and recommendations was requested and granted in order that certain studies concerning constitutional law could be carried to completion. The Attorney General and others have carefully investigated the legal phases of the questions involved, and their conclusions were considered by the commission in formulating its final report.

During the course of its deliberations the commission held a series of open hearings, at which many witnesses advanced diverse proposals and opinions bearing upon the intricate problems that presented themselves for study. The names of these witnesses and the complete testimony submitted by each accompanied our preliminary report.

In accordance with the decision of the members there will be promptly prepared and submitted to the President a summarized analysis of the testimony and copies of the legal opinions presented to the commission.

A copy of the resolution creating the commission and an account of the proceedings subsequent to December 4, 1931, are appended.

Respectfully yours,

PATRICK J. HURLEY,
Secretary of War,
Chairman of the Commission.

REPORT OF COMMISSION CREATED BY PUBLIC RESOLUTION NO. 98, SEVENTY-FIRST CONGRESS, APPROVED JUNE 27, 1930

MARCH 5, 1932.

To the PRESIDENT:

The commission appointed under Public Resolution No. 98, Seventy-first Congress, entitled "Joint resolution to promote peace and to equalize the burdens and to minimize the profits of war," respectfully submits the following report and recommendations:

First. We recommend, in order to eliminate all doubt concerning the extent of the power of the Congress to prevent profiteering and to stabilize prices in time of war, that a proposed constitutional amendment clearly defining such power be submitted by the Congress to the States.

Second. We further recommend that until a constitutional amendment be adopted clearly defining the power of Congress to prevent profiteering and to stabilize prices in time of war, the following program be adopted as governmental policy in order effectively to minimize the profits of war and to distribute its burdens and sacrifices equitably:

(a) That the Congress should empower the President, in the event of war, to institute a program under which prices may be stabilized and thereafter adjusted at such levels as will minimize inflation and will secure to the Government the use of any private property needed in the prosecution of the war without affording the owner thereof profit due to the war. It should be clearly stated that such a program will not be placed in operation until Congress specifically directs it as a necessary measure in the conduct of the war.

(b) The Congress should empower the President to make, in war, such readjustments in, additions to, the executive departments of the Government as are necessary to assure adequate control of all national resources. The President should be empowered also to fix the status, for the period of the war, of personnel transferred under this authority from one bureau or department of the Government to any other.

(c) Existing law empowering the President to compel acceptance of war orders and to commandeer property should be continued.

(d) In addition to all other plans to remove the profits of war, the revenue law should provide that, upon any declaration of war and during the period of such emergency, individuals and corporations shall be taxed 95 per cent of all income above the previous 3 year average, with proper adjustments for capital expenditures for war purposes by existing or new industries.

(e) In time of peace continuous planning by the Federal Government, particularly by the War and Navy Departments, should be directed toward insuring:

(1) That upon declaration of war there shall be immediately available to the Congress accurate and detailed estimates concerning the man-power and material needs of the military and naval services, together with detailed studies and recommendations concerning the most applicable methods for mobilizing the necessary men and procuring the required munitions.

(2) That there shall be no competitive bidding between Government agencies for the products of industry.

(3) There shall be no placing of contracts in excess of needs.

(4) That cost-plus-percentage methods of purchase shall be eliminated.

(5) That the munitions-production load shall be distributed properly over the United States.

(6) That the governmental organizations required in the administration of war functions shall be set up promptly.

(7) That the necessary controls respecting prices, raw materials, transportation, priorities, war trade, finances, and related matters shall be continuously studied, so that in the event of war the will of Congress may be promptly and efficiently administered.

(f) Plans prepared in the War and Navy Departments for the accomplishment of the above should be continuously revised to meet changing national and international conditions, and should be thoroughly examined and revised at least every two years by appropriate congressional committees.

Third. We recommend that no constitutional amendment to permit the taking of private property in time of war without compensation be considered by the Congress.

Respectfully submitted.

PATRICK J. HURLEY,
Chairman.
DAVID A. REED,
Vice Chairman.
JOE T. ROBINSON.
JOHN J. McSWAIN.

MINORITY REPORT

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS,
Washington, D. C., March 3, 1932.

To the PRESIDENT:

The purpose in creating the so-called War Policies Commission was to "study and consider amending the Constitution of the United States to provide that private property may be taken by Congress for public use during war and methods of equalizing the burdens and to remove the profits of war, together with a study of policies to be pursued in the event of war."

I take it that the object of the resolution creating the commission deals solely with the purpose of eliminating profits that accrue to certain classes of individuals and corporations during war and that "a study of policies to be pursued in the event of war" relates to policies to be prescribed by Congress either through a constitutional amendment or by legislation for the purpose of eliminating war profits.

As the Constitution of the United States is now drawn I am convinced that the only way to eliminate war profits is through the adoption of a constitutional amendment so as to enable Congress to pass legislation creating an agency to fix prices of commodities, either for the purpose of keeping profits at a minimum or the entire elimination of them. I heartily favor the adoption of a constitutional amendment to carry out this object.

I do not believe it was the intention of Congress that the power to fix prices of commodities should be delegated to military men. I believe that such administrative matters should be entirely in the hands of civilians, and I object to any recommendation that would tend to confer upon military men the power to regulate prices or the activities of the civilian population during war or at any other time. I am firmly convinced, whether intended or not, that any war planning as now carried on by the War Department will in the end result in the administration of price fixing laws and the regulation of civilian activities by military and naval officers if the recommendations of the majority members of the commission are finally adopted by Congress.

I regret that I am unable to follow the majority of the members of the commission upon all of their proposals and respectfully submit to you this dissent.

Very respectfully,

ROSS A. COLLINS.

Approved, June 27, 1930.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, the commission in the course of its hearings accumulated probably the most valuable compilation of expert and dependable testimony which can ever be put at the service of the country in a subsequent martial difficulty. Those volumes of testimony, taken from all the great civil and military leaders who participated in our World War experience, will be on file for permanent reference in connection with the ultimate work of the commission. This testimony charts both mistakes and advantages, assets and liabilities, which developed in our national experience in organizing the country to fight for its life. It mobilizes these lessons for the benefit of to-morrow. It is the voice of recommendation and admonition. Let none misunderstand the final purpose we have sought to serve in this whole connection. It is not to facilitate war. It is to discourage it if a commercial motive should ever influence such decisions, and to democratize it if, despite all honorable efforts, it comes.

We immediately discovered, Mr. President, that the popular and abstractly laudable notion of actually and physically drafting capital or labor in time of war is an impractical impossibility. As a matter of fact, the commission was foreclosed from considering the drafting of labor. But the commission is practically unanimous in the view that it has achieved a formula which better reaches the objective and which accomplishes everything the original order of Congress had in its purview and which totally answers the aspirations of the American Legion as expressed for the last decade and repeatedly stressed in its annual conventions and as shared by all straight thinkers with a proper conception of the relative duties and obligations incumbent upon all citizens in a democracy.

The program, very briefly summarized, falls into three parts and in connection with two of them I am suggesting action by the Senate this morning, so that this unusually pregnant movement may lose no impetus, because I think we will all agree that if war can be demonetized in its impulses we shall have made one of the most practical possible contributions to real and useful pacifism of a type which every American can cordially appprove unless he nurses the unholy aspiration to capitalize some subsequent disaster in the rôle of a war profiteer.

The first recommendation of the committee revolves around the freezing of commodity prices at the time of entry into a martial conflict. It is the opinion of a majority of the commission, supported by substantial legal authority, that Congress already possesses the necessary and adequate power to proceed in this fashion, but, in view of a possible cloud of doubt upon that authority, the commission has unanimously recommended consideration by Congress of a constitutional amendment, and, for the purpose of initiating definitely this phase of the recommendation, I introduce, Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], and myself, a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. DILL. I am very much interested in this question; I should like to have the proposed constitutional amendment submitted by the Senator read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 115) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the fixing of prices in time of war and the prevention of profiteering was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States:

"ARTICLE —

"At the end of the fifth amendment change the period to a semicolon and add the following:

"'Provided, however, That in time of war Congress may regulate or provide for the regulation of prices, rent, or compensation to be exacted or paid by any person in respect of the sale, rent, or use of any real or personal property, tangible or intangible, without regard to any limitation contained in this article or any other article of the Constitution.'"

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, this is the recommendation of the commission, so far as the Senate is concerned, to carry out the proposal of the American Legion that we shall draft property the same as we draft men?

Mr. VANDENBERG. If the Senator will permit me to conclude my summarizing of the report, he will see that the proposed constitutional amendment touches but one factor and merely initiates the more vital substance.

Mr. DILL. But this is the only recommendation for an amendment of the Constitution, I understand?

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is correct.

Mr. DILL. And when we are proposing to amend the Constitution it is suggested by the commission to amend it only so that the Government can fix profits, not prevent profits?

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator may put his own paraphrase upon the amendment. I shall proceed subsequently to indicate that his implied criticism is without foundation.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Michigan merely asks that the joint resolution proposing a constitutional amendment be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Now, Mr. President, in the theory of the commission as it has sought to remove the profits and equalize the burdens of war so far as it may be done by law—and I reiterate that this is a unanimous report, at least so far as the representatives of the Senate and the Cabinet are concerned—the further proposal is that after the commodity price index has been appropriately and equitably set at the inception of a war, if subsequently any extraordinary profits seep through they shall practically all be closed into the Treasury of the United States through a special tax of 95 per cent upon all earnings of corporations and individuals; that is, a tax of 95 per cent on the excess of the corporate or the individual income as compared with the average income for the three preceding years. In other words, money, whether earned by property or services, shall no longer escape common contribution in so far as this objective is susceptible of mandate. The Senate will note that we have entirely avoided the difficulty previously involved in the old so-called excess-profits tax, which required a calculation of invested capital and resulted in endless litigation and argument and perplexity and evasion.

In order to bring this phase of the program definitely and specifically to the attention of Congress in tangible form for congressional action, the commission is anxious to submit this phase of its report to the Treasury Department, with the request for specific recommendations relative to ways and means for developing the 95 per cent tax program. Therefore, Mr. President, again on behalf of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], and myself, I offer a resolution and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). The resolution will be reported for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 180), as follows:

Resolved, That the report of the War Policies Commission, in which is recommended the application in time of war of a 95 per cent tax on all incomes of corporations and of individuals in excess of the prior 3-year average income, be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury for a prompt expression of his detailed recommendations and opinions.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Did the committee take into consideration the advisability of fixing prices in time of peace as well as in time of war? Why it is wise to fix prices in time of war and not wise to fix prices in time of peace? If we are going into this proposition I am in favor of giving authority to fix prices in time of peace.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, all the administrators from the war period came before us and argued, I think without exception, that the starting point in the control of war profits must be a fixed price index with respect to commodities involved in the necessary national defense.

Mr. BORAH. I understand that; but, so far as the interests of the people as a whole are concerned, why should not prices in time of peace be fixed the same as in time of war? The concentration of wealth is causing more human suffering than war, the curse lasts longer and the evils are greater.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The problem of peace-time price fixing or peace-time profits of any nature was not within the permitted purview of the commission. We were involved solely with the problem given to us by Congress under the resolution to undertake to equalize the burden and to remove the profits of war so far as possible.

Mr. BORAH. And the question of doing the same thing in time of peace did not come before the committee?

Mr. VANDENBERG. It did not. It could not. It is not a part of our problem. It is unrelated because the régimes of peace and war inevitably involve totally different conceptions and necessities. All of us consent to rules in time of war which would be unthinkable in times of peace.

Mr. BORAH. In view of the fact that it is proposed to amend the Constitution so as to control prices in time of war, what does the Senator think of making it broad enough to cover the proposition in time of peace, in case we desire to do so? Both propositions relate to human welfare, and, in my opinion, the one may be sustained on the same ground as the other.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The view of the Senator from Michigan is that the proposed amendment to the Constitution being submitted to the Judiciary Committee, of which the Senator from Idaho is a distinguished member, in connection with the committee's study, if the Senator wants to broaden the contemplation of the proposed amendment, I shall be glad to go into that with him. I have not gone into it up to the present time.

Mr. BORAH. I was simply speaking of having the Senator from Michigan consider it when the matter comes before the committee.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I have never considered it up to the present time. It seems to me the commission had a sufficient contract to carry out in connection with the actual problems submitted to its consideration. I do not want to confuse the issue.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I think the resolution is of sufficient importance to go over for a day and to be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Does the Senator understand that the resolution simply asks the Secretary of the Treasury for essential information?

Mr. KING. It asks his opinion, as I understand the resolution, with respect to the method of procedure that could be employed for the purpose of imposing a 95 per cent tax upon certain income or profits in time of war.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Solely so that Congress may have complete information when it undertakes to consider the problem on its merits.

Mr. KING. I may say to the Senator that my view is that in time of war Congress has now full, plenary power not only to impose a 95 per cent tax upon profits but to take all of the profits from business and to take property itself—of course, under the Constitution, by affording proper compensation. During the World War, as the Senator well knows, we took ships and property, lands, houses, and personal property, and remitted the owners oftentimes, if they refused to take the amount which was tendered, to the courts in order that they might obtain adequate compensation for the property taken. As the Senator knows, war sets aside largely peace-time laws and, perhaps, constitutional provisions, and in time of war it seems to me we can accomplish all that is recommended by the Senator from Michigan in the report which he submits.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator is discussing the merits of the question. I am asking him to permit the resolution to be adopted so that the available information may be on hand when the merits of the question shall be before the Senate for its consideration.

Mr. KING. Would the Senator object to letting the resolution go over until to-morrow?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Not if the Senator insists on it; I could not object.

Mr. KING. I want to please the Senator, but I think he ought to let the resolution go over.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat, I want to know what reason the committee had for refusing to recommend a constitutional amendment that would carry out the great plan which the American Legion so enthusiastically put forward looking to the enactment of laws that would enable Congress to draft property in time of war the same as it drafts men.

Mr. VANDENBERG. To answer the Senator's question with any finality would require me to enter upon a discussion which would be longer, I am sure, than the Senator would desire to precipitate at the moment. Let me answer him just to this extent: In seeking to equalize—let me emphasize the verb "equalize"—the burdens of war it was speedily disclosed by the witnesses before the commission that an arbitrary drafting of property might actually create a larger discrepancy in the burden of war through the drafting of one unit in a given industry and the release of the other units from any such imposition.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let me finish. The commission came to the conclusion, based, I believe and as I recall, upon the preponderating weight of the testimony, that the ultimate recapture of any profits accruing from the operation of war adequately and in practical fashion accomplished all that the Senator has in mind.

Mr. DILL. Let me ask the Senator where does he get the principle of which he speaks, namely, the equalizing of profits to individuals and to property? There was nothing to that effect in the resolution that was adopted appointing the commission of which the Senator is a member. That resolution looked to the taking out of war the profits on property used in war; and yet the commission comes back here and recommends that we go to the great trouble of amending the Constitution of the United States, without including within the power given Congress the right of Congress to exercise its judgment on that question, if ever the time should come when it wanted to take that step. I want to know where the Senator gets the equalization idea of which he speaks.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I remind the Senator that the instructions to the commission included the admonition to undertake an equalization of the burdens as well as the prohibition of war profits.

Mr. DILL. But we have a right now to limit the profits.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator's present argument, going to the merits of the case, may very appropriately be addressed to the Judiciary Committee. I am simply submitting the findings of the commission after one year's intimate study in contact with the best authority and advice that we could procure.

Mr. DILL. I am a member of the Judiciary Committee, but the point I am trying to make is this: I had considerable to do with the passage of the joint resolution. The joint resolution specifically was directed to taking the profit out of war.

Mr. VANDENBERG. And we think we have done that.

Mr. DILL. And the commission has recommended an amendment, not to take the profit out of war but to give the Congress the right to limit the profit, to fix the profit.

Mr. VANDENBERG. On the contrary——

Mr. DILL. In other words, it looks to me as though the commission in this situation is like the mountain that labored and brought forth a mouse.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That may be the Senator's view. I think it is not the view of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] or the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] or the Members of the House or the members of the Cabinet who labored for one year upon this problem. If the specific and tangible removal of 95 per cent of the profits of war is not a direct frontal attack upon war profiteering, then I do not know how to make it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator from Washington is quite right, I think, in assuming that the whole purpose of the position of the American Legion has been to take the profits out of war, and to eliminate profiteering. The subject has been before the Senate a number of times, and I think before the Committee on Military Affairs. A great deal of evidence has been taken. This is the first time I have ever had any notion that it was necessary to amend the Constitution of the United States to carry out the program of the American Legion—which is, I think, the program of most of those who saw service in the World War—that property might be drafted, wealth might be drafted, the same as individuals for the front-line trenches.

I recognize that this is a matter that goes to the merits of the question, and I shall be glad to study the subject when it comes before the Committee on the Judiciary. I am forced, however, to express my surprise that it has been found necessary in carrying out a joint resolution of this kind to suggest to the Senate that we must set up the cumbersome machinery of amending the Constitution of the United States to get at a question which is comparatively simple. Furthermore——

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let me say there——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Just a second, and then I shall be glad to be interrupted.

Furthermore, Mr. President, everybody who understands anything about amending the Constitution of the United States knows that it is practically impossible—so nearly impossible, at any rate, that in 144 years it has been amended but nineteen times. I do not think it is necessary at all, from what study I have been able to make of this question, and for a number of years I have studied it at least to the best of my ability. I think we can enact legislation that will do the job, and I think such legislation ought to be enacted. I do not think it ought to be left to the tender mercies of numerous interests throughout the country that would work with every legislature in the country to prevent amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

That is just a statement made without having studied carefully the recommendation of the commission, of which the Senator from Michigan is an honored member.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I want to be very sure that there is no cloud of doubt left upon the reason why a constitutional amendment is submitted, because it would be exceedingly unfortunate if it were misconstrued.

It was the majority opinion in the commission that no constitutional amendment is necessary, and when the Senator from Indiana examines the report he will find it specifically indicated that the commission believes that adequate power exists to-day to accomplish the results which the commission is recommending. We do not desert this position. We do not propose to wait for new authority before invoking the new formula. In an excess of caution, however, and purely supplementary to the situation as I have just defined it, at the request of a minority of the commission, and solely to bulwark the proposition and to remove any ultimate and final doubt, the suggestion of a constitutional amendment is made.

In conclusion, I will say that the recommendation of the American Legion, through its legal department, is precisely in line with the opinion expressed by the Senator from Indiana, which I also entirely share, that a constitutional amendment is not necessary.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Up to date we have never been able to get a measure of this kind out of the Senate committee, much less get the Constitution of the United States amended to provide for it.

I think the resolution ought to go over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution goes over until to-morrow.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma and Mr. McKELLAR addressed the Chair.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McNARY. Is not this argument proceeding by unanimous consent?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is all out of order.

Mr. McNARY. I do not want to invoke the rule or suggest the regular order of procedure; but I want to get to the pending appropriation bill.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. DILL. What rule says that we can not discuss a subject when a bill is before the Senate? Why is unanimous consent required to discuss a subject when the agricultural bill is before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Just as soon as an amendment is offered, discussion will be in order.

Mr. McNARY. Yes; but there is no amendment pending at this time. The bill itself is the unfinished business. I am willing to be patient; I have been for 40 minutes; but I want to get the appropriation bill before the Senate and get through with it. If the argument is so vital in the mind of the Senator from Washington, however, he may speak further when the first amendment is offered.

Mr. DILL. I simply do not want the rule to be laid down here that Senators can speak only by unanimous consent when a great legislative bill is before the Senate. It is not requisite to have an amendment pending to discuss the agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. McNARY. That is a rule as old as this institution itself. There is nothing pending before the Senate but the unfinished business. No amendment has been offered, and it is only by unanimous consent that Senators have been speaking. If the Senator will be patient until an amendment is offered, then he may speak at length.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD a copy of House Joint Resolution 251, Public Resolution No. 98 of the Seventy-first Congress.

There being no objection, the joint resolution, approved June 27, 1930, was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[PUBLIC RESOLUTION—No. 98—SEVENTY-FIRST CONGRESS]

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburgh, Pa., protesting against the passage of Senate bill 3643, providing for the regulation of common carriers by water engaged in interstate commerce through the Panama Canal, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of the State of New York, praying for the prompt ratification of the World Court protocols, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Kiwanis Club, the Rotary Club, and the Lions Club, respectively, of Troy, N. He also presented resolutions adopted by the Oneida County American Legion, of Utica, N. Y., and of Hollis Post, No. 2247, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, of Hollis, Long Island, N. Y., remonstrating against the making of further reductions in appropriations for the Army and Navy, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

SENATOR GEORGE W. NORRIS

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Hon. Josephus Daniels is the owner of a newspaper at Raleigh, N. C., by the name of the News and Observer. I think every Senator knows who Mr. Daniels is and knows about his paper. I have in my hand an editorial from that paper, of date March 4, 1932, with regard to a distinguished Member of this body. I think it is one of the most timely editorials about any man connected with the Senate that I have seen for a long time, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be read by the clerk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield for that purpose?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the editorial will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[From the Raleigh (N. C.) News and Observer of March 4, 1932]

THAT MAN NORRIS

Senator GEORGE W. NORRIS, of Nebraska, has one more river to cross before he completes a remarkable trinity of major legislation at this session of Congress.

Behind him is the constitutional amendment ready for submission to the States, to put an end to the "lame-duck" sessions of Congress. Behind him, also, so far as the Senate is concerned, is the anti-injunction bill for which he conducted an 8-year campaign. Ahead of him is the Muscle Shoals measure committing the Government to the operation of the plant for the benefit of the American people.

Seven votes only were cast against the "lame-duck" amendment in the Senate and five only were registered against the anti-injunction bill. All of the five negative votes, it is significant, came from New England Senators.

And so again, NORRIS emerges as a personality above party, drawing support from progressives of both parties in his undeviating antagonism to reaction wherever it is manifest.

What manner of man is this who has always flouted political organization of the machine variety, who has spent most of his public life in a battle against bosses and against governmental control by the interested, who has found it neither necessary nor expedient to yield his principles to party preference, and who as often as not has been arrayed against the powers of his own party, without loss of prestige or confidence among his own constituency or popular following in the country at large?

Literally GEORGE NORRIS was born fighting. He had two alternatives: To fight or perish. Soon after he was born on an Ohio farm his father died. His only brother was killed in the War between the States. In the straightened condition of the family, he worked as a farm hand on neighboring farms, attended brief winter sessions of the rural school, and qualified himself for more fighting. He became a school-teacher but he was not content with the relatively larger degree of ease as a teacher. It was an opportunity to acquire the funds for college. He paid his way through the university. More fighting then as a private student of law.

In 1885, two years after he received his license to practice, NORRIS moved to Nebraska. He embraced the opportunity for public service. He served three times as prosecuting attorney, twice by appointment and once by election. Ten years later he was elected judge, served two terms of four years each, leaving the bench to take his place in the Fifty-eighth Congress.

NORRIS entered Congress as a Republican, and aside from his native independence, his pride in the integrity of his own mind, a readiness to do battle any time for a conviction, there was no suggestion of insurgency. Certainly, in the boss-ridden House there was then no room for insurgency and no hope.

Somebody with an eye for the dramatic has picked the day and the hour of this man's personal declaration of political independence. But such deep forces are not usually created and set running full power in a converting flash. It is interesting, however, as it reflects the machine that tempted GEORGE NORRIS, not with the rewards of conformity but with a new opportunity for battle in a good cause.

NORRIS, according to the romantic version of his evolution, was catapulted into insurgency by the withering rebuke of the Republican whip when, as a young though ambitious Member, he dared cast his vote as a lone Republican with the Democratic Members on some ridiculously trivial question.

But he did not lack for opportunities. Cannonism then running riot was a challenge that NORRIS could not forego. In the historic fight of 1910 he was in the front rank of the determined group which pledged itself to strip the Speakership of the House of the wide powers which made Uncle Joe Cannon the embodiment of legislative despotism.

NORRIS did not go to Congress for the novelty of the thing, for the fame of it, for the money, or the social prestige. Cannonism stood in the way of anything and everything he might strive for which did not have the machine blessing. He had learned to fight, to think, and to use the weapon of a remarkable oratory with telling effect. It is history that he won, and thereafter was virtually drafted by the people of Nebraska for the Senate, where he found companionship of a kindred mind in Robert M. La Follette, whose toga, as the titular head of insurgent Republicans, he inherited.

Yet, despite his unceasing opposition to party programs which ran counter to his conceptions of popular government, he arose to the chairmanship of the Senate Agriculture Committee and held that until voluntarily he decided to relinquish it. Moreover, he was not read out of his party, along with other insurgents, for his historic support of the La Follette cause. Directly after these associates were relieved of choice committee assignments in the name of conventional party practice, NORRIS showed his characteristic unconcern for party mandate by announcing that he would stump the State of Pennsylvania for Democratic William B. Wilson against William S. Vare.

This was a typical turn of the man who came to loggerheads with President Coolidge over Muscle Shoals, whose place in the esteem of the people of Nebraska is evidenced by the fact that in his campaign for reelection he found the Republican machine of his own State reinforced by the money and the questionable tactics of the national organization.

"It does not make any difference who or how many men run against NORRIS," said a prominent Democrat of Nebraska when opposition within his own party had resorted to the lowest form of political trickery to beat him. "He's unbeatable in Nebraska."

Holding now a position unique in American public life, certainly unique in party history, Senator NORRIS still goes about the business of shaking intrenched power and making government more directly responsive to the public will and the public good.

Such is the aim of the "lame-duck" amendment. Such was the purpose of the anti-injunction measure for which labor has struggled almost hopelessly through the years. That bill puts the stamp of approval—if any were needed—on the right of workingmen to organize for collective bargaining. At the same time it bulwarks that right by making unenforceable in United States courts a blood contract, exacted from men who must work or starve, binding them not to join an organization of their fellow workers, although the right of an employer to join an association of employers is unquestioned.

Moreover, the bill would curb the power of judges in contempt cases. Under it a judge can no longer in the secrecy of chambers, without a hearing, on ex parte evidence or no evidence at all, issue an injunction in behalf of an employer in a labor dispute. The power of contempt rules, the holy of holies of judicial arrogance, is attacked in its most vital spot. A judge, in accordance with the Norris bill, still has the necessary and the wise authority to punish for contempt committed in the presence of the court or near enough to the court to obstruct justice. He will have no power, if the measure becomes a law, to throw an editor or any other responsible critic in jail for exercising his inalienable right of free speech. The judge still may initiate contempt proceedings for such cause, but he can not sit as prosecutor, judge, and jury in the contempt case in which he is primarily interested.

Now remains Muscle Shoals. The hope of the people in this property of vast Government investments and potential worth rests largely in the leadership of Senator NORRIS. It isn't a new fight. It has dragged out through the years. Coolidge vetoed one bill. Hoover came to the White House publicly pledged to its operation by the Government for the benefit of farmers and power users. Any preelection purpose he might have had has been thwarted by powers which have spread their control over legislation during three Republican régimes.

Government operation of Muscle Shoals means cheaper power for the people. It means cheaper power for all the people, because in the face of its operation, divorced from the profit demands of the Power Trust's watered stock, the whole artificially inflated fabric of power rates will be exposed to a condemnation that will be quick and effective.

So we hear the Government must not go into business. Anything that Government may do in the interest of the whole people is injecting the Government in business or is damned as a dole. But we are learning a lot about business in Government and Government in business when one day the Government lends millions of dollars to the Wabash Railroad and the next day more millions to the Southern, all the while pouring a steady stream of warming gold into the frozen vaults of the banks.

Senator NORRIS is an authority on the sort of business that the Government can undertake with the blessings of the intrenched interests. He has come to close grips with it before. He has fought it unflinchingly. The hope that it may now be exposed for the hideous thing it is depends very largely upon his leadership.

His victories this week challenge him to the unfinished task of Muscle Shoals.

UNITED STATES VETERANS' HOSPITAL, LAKE CITY, FLA.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I send to the desk a splendid editorial from the Jacksonville (Fla.) Journal, of the 3d instant, indorsing the proposal for the enlarging of the facilities of the veterans' hospital located at Lake City, Fla., and ask that the editorial be printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the editorial was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Jacksonville (Fla.) Journal, March 3, 1932]

IDEAL LOCATION FOR A HOSPITAL

A proposal to enlarge United States Veterans' Hospital No. 63, at Lake City, by 200 beds is embodied in a bill introduced in the United States Senate by Senator PARK TRAMMELL and in the House by Representative R. A. GREEN. The bill provides for an expenditure of Federal funds not to exceed $800,000.

It would seem that this bill ought to go through without much opposition, if any. The need of the additional hospital facilities is admitted, as there are hundreds of veterans, it is reported, on the waiting list for hospitalization to which they are entitled but which can not be given them. Such a condition ought not to be allowed to continue.

The case in favor of the Lake City addition is strengthened considerably by reason of the fact that the American Legion, at its national convention, indorsed and urged it. Since the Legion is certainly not biased in favor of Florida but is only interested in the welfare of veterans who need treatment, this indorsement should go a long way toward getting the improvement. The Florida Legion convention last summer also voted its indorsement.

One of the principal reasons why Florida is considered most desirable for a soldiers' hospital is its equable climate. This is not only of prime importance as it affects the health and comfort of the patients, but it is important as affecting operating costs. The item of heating alone in such an institution is a very large one. In this climate this item would certainly be very low, as compared with that in any northern location.

No doubt these considerations accounted for the fact that Veterans' Hospital No. 63 was located at Lake City in the first place. The hospital unit now there has been a great success. It is reported to have the lowest per capita cost of all veterans' hospitals in the country and a fine record of success in treatment of the various illnesses.

Physicians everywhere are now stressing the advantages of sunlight and fresh air in the treatment of sick people. The fine climate of Lake City affords these vital necessities in abundance—winter and summer. The veterans themselves are especially eager to come to Florida, and reports are that there are some 300 now on the waiting list to get into the Lake City hospital.

Another advantage for the veterans in being in a Florida hospital is the availability of fresh fruits and vegetables. Hospitals specialize in these for invalid diets and use huge quantities of them. In Florida they are abundant and comparatively cheap.

It is to be hoped that all Florida's Representatives and Senators will push this proposal vigorously, and they have very good chances of success by reason of the natural advantages offered by Florida.

ST. DAVID'S DAY—LEADING AMERICANS OF WELSH DESCENT

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I have the pleasure of presenting to the Senate an address commemorating St. David's Day, March 1, by J. Charles Jones, of San Francisco, Calif., together with an article on leading Americans of Welsh descent, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and it is as follows:

MEN OF OUR NATION—THE CYMRY

By J. Charles Jones, of San Francisco

The history of the Cambrian race is founded in antiquity—and while many nations have come, flourished greatly in their time, and thereafter entered into a positive decline, the accomplishments of that great nation of Britons have abided and shall abide even unto eternity.

This is because the race of Britons has been occupied not with the upbuilding and erection of great temples made of perishable marble but because their minds and hearts have been continuously directed toward the gaining and preservation of the civil and religious liberty of their nation.

What has been accomplished has stood as a noble example to the liberty-loving people of the entire world.

It is well to contemplate the majestic marble temples and structures of ancient Greece and Rome, but, oh, how far better to contemplate the actions of the princes, warriors, statesmen, and people of ancient Wales in their continuous struggle for liberty and freedom.

The principles of civil and religious liberty have attained their greatest degree of perfection in this land of America, and we find the substance of these principles dating back to an immemorial period and embodied in the ancient Cambrian laws of the early Britons. At all times these laws have stood for honesty, justice, mercy, and liberty. The laws of Wales never recognized the law of primogeniture, under which the honors and property were passed to the eldest son and the remainder of the family permitted to rest under injustice.

The Welsh never permitted their people to be harshly adjudged by a single man, but in their laws applied the sacred right of trial by jury.

The unchangeable quality of Welsh institutions may be considered in connection with the continuing quality of their language. As to the language of Wales, learned writers have long ago said: "This ancient language is, after the passage of over 4,000 years, preserved even to our time, a strange thing that so ancient a language should now be spoken by the Britons of Wales. These are the people who have the honor to preserve the language of the posterity of Gomer."

Christianity in its beginning, in Wales, came direct from the Holy Land and did not come intermediately through any other nation. By reason of this fact religious freedom has always been of a high quality in Wales, and it is well to know that the first Christian king of all Europe was a Briton.

The greatness of a nation depends not so much upon the large number of its people as upon the quality of their minds and hearts, and upon their will to fight on and on for human liberty—security of the body and freedom of the soul.

If the greatness of a nation depended upon the large number of powerful military legions which its king or emperor might be able to place upon the fields of battle, then would the nation of Alexander the Great have preserved its greatness of the time of Alexander. The principles of human liberty for which the Welsh have always fought are destined to continue forever, and as to the inspiration flowing therefrom no one is able to calculate its value or effect upon the other peoples of the earth, who have been engaged from time to time in their struggles for human liberty.

The Romans, Saxons, and Normans came from the Continent of Europe, but neither of those people brought into the island of Britain that great right of trial by jury, which had from time immemorial existed among the Welsh and among the ancient Britons.

Of what avail is it for the jurists of England to boast of the liberty guaranteed by their laws, unless they also acknowledge that the Welsh brought to them their right of trial by jury, without which no nation can rightfully claim to be in the enjoyment of liberty, free and unhampered?

In the early history of England there existed for a long time a conflict in the laws, and a continued struggle was seen between the system of laws, based upon Welsh law, which had been continued by Alfred the Great within the borders of England, and the system of laws which had come from continental Europe and which was based upon the laws of Justinian, but there was destined to be the final triumph of the principles which came from the ancient laws of Wales, and which constitute the principles of the common law of England to this day.

Magna Charta, that early portion of the constitution of Great Britain, at one and the same time guaranteed the liberty of Wales as well as of England. The principles of the laws of Wales and of the Magna Charta have been well and substantially reflected in the language of the American Declaration of Independence.

The laws of Wales, first compiled by the great lawgiver Dyfnwal Moelmud, living about 400 B. C., were translated into Latin for use in the boundaries of England, and were by the Saxon King caused to be translated into Saxon and thenceforth used as the common law of England.

It is not possible for any system of English laws to ignore the laws of ancient Wales, which went into the formation of the common law of England. These Welsh laws were carried over to speak the language of liberty unto what has become a great nation, and their body and substance came over later into these United States in the form of the Declaration of Independence, and in its Constitution, and in the form of its statutory law, which many in error believe has taken its form entirely from the preceding law of England, but which in reality has taken the spirit thereof from the laws of ancient Wales. And those laws of America are still continuing to guarantee equality of civil and religious liberty and to extend liberty in the matters of conscience, life, property, and human happiness. Under the laws of Wales land was held by the inhabitants in freehold tenure, and therefore there were no feudal retainers of an overlord, and thus it may with pride be said that in Wales there never at any time had been any serfs. Wales was no land in which serfdom might flourish or even gain a foothold.

How well the fine spirit of the free-born Welshman is shown by the following happening: When King James was visiting Chester he was met by a great number of horsemen, who formed a guard of honor. The weather was warm and the road dusty, and His Majesty was greatly inconvenienced by the crowd pressing around his coach, so he told one of his attendants to disperse them politely. The nobleman thereupon put his head out of the window and said: "It is the King's pleasure that all who are gentlemen should ride forward." Away they all rode as if for life, save one man. "And so, sir, you are not a gentleman, then?" observed the King. "Oh, yes, please, Your Majesty," was the reply, "but the horse, God help him, is not so good." "Every man is a gentleman in Wales," was the remark of His Majesty.

It was the inborn love of liberty which caused the large number of men of Welsh blood to give their support to the cause of liberty in America and their assistance as soldiers in the Army of Washington. In the Revolutionary Army and in the cause of human liberty Washington had the support of the following soldiers of Welsh blood: Generals Anthony Wayne, Isaac Shelby, Morgan Lewis, William R. Davie, Edward Stephens, Charles Lee, Richard Winn, Daniel Morgan, John Cadwallader, Andrew Lewis, Otho H. Williams, John Thomas, Joseph Williams, and James Reese. And with them in the Revolutionary Army were seven other men of Welsh blood holding the military command of colonel.

The last-mentioned were David Humphreys, Lambert Cadwallader, Richard Howell, Ethan Allen, Henry Lee, Thomas Marshall, and James Williams. It is thus seen that among the higher officers of the Revolutionary Army were 14 generals and 7 colonels, with, of course, others of lesser rank, some of them born in Wales and the others of Welsh blood. That distinguished jurist, Chief Justice John Marshall, and his father were both commissioned officers under Washington, and were with the American Army at Valley Forge.

At a later time Roger B. Taney was Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court. He came from a Welsh family which had been located for some time in the United States. Charles Evans Hughes, who is of Welsh descent, has held the high office of Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. David Davis, who was of Welsh descent and an honored friend of Abraham Lincoln, was at one time Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. Of the men of Welsh blood who were associated in the framing of the American Constitution were Gouverneur Morris, William Few, and James Madison.

In the early American Navy were to be found Commodore Ezekiel Hopkins, of Rhode Island, and later other men of Welsh blood, as shown by their names—Commodores Rogers, Perry, Jacob Jones, and Ap Catesby Jones, and later our brave Admiral Sampson, the hero of the Battle of Santiago. Ezekiel Hopkins was first given a commission as brigadier general in the Revolutionary Army, and in December, 1775, he was by Congress commissioned as Commander in Chief of the American Navy.

And it appears that the American flag was first raised in California by Commodore Ap Catesby Jones. It was at a later period lowered, and thereafter a second time raised by Commodore Sloat.

Of that great band of patriots who signed the Declaration of Independence, 18 were of Welsh blood, and quite a number of these were born in Wales.

That noble character Thomas Jefferson took a most important position in contending for the rights of freedom as set forth in that great declaration. That charter of the rights of a free nation, which not only firmly and solemnly declared the principles of liberty within this Nation but also has stood forth as a guiding light to the people of other nations, was written by Thomas Jefferson, a man of Welsh blood. To Thomas Jefferson, more than to any other person, is due the abolition of all connection between the church and state in this Nation. The right of religious freedom and to worship according to one's own conscience was first established in America by Roger Williams, of Rhode Island, a Welshman, and the good example thereby set was soon thereafter followed in Maryland. The laws of Wales did not favor the right of primogeniture, and so with the beliefs which Thomas Jefferson had attained, and which were in unison with the political beliefs of his ancestors, he succeeded in procuring in Virginia the abolition of all laws in favor of the rights of primogeniture.

And the efforts of Thomas Jefferson were strong and of great avail in having the Constitution of the United States declare for the sound security of State rights, by the adoption of the amendatory language thereof, which reads: "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people."

It is gratifying to note that in this Nation and at this day the entire population continue to give their strong adherence to all of the principles of government which were so strongly enunciated by Jefferson, and which were, as we have seen, but the pronouncement of Welsh justice as determined and fixed in the form of their ancient laws.

At the time of Oliver Cromwell one of the regicides was Gen. Thomas Harrison, a native of Wales. The name of Oliver Cromwell at his birth was Williams, his Welsh family name, and he was related to Roger Williams, the founder of Rhode Island, and who first declared for religious liberty in America. The name Cromwell was the name of his mother's family, and he took the name Cromwell in order to inherit certain property.

Several of the descendants of the first-named Gen. Thomas Harrison, the companion of Cromwell, were thereafter to become very prominent in the political history of the United States.

Two Presidents of the United States—William Henry Harrison and Benjamin Harrison of our day—were both descendants of Gen. Thomas Harrison, the regicide, and companion in arms of Oliver Cromwell. Gen. Benjamin F. Butler, who during our Civil War was in high command of an army of the North, and later was Attorney General of the United States, was a lineal descendant on his mother's side of John Jones, who was another of the regicides who supported the commonwealth at the time of Cromwell.

Among the signers of the Declaration of Independence many are found to have been of Welsh birth or descent, nearly one-third of the total number of men who signed. Among those signers of the Declaration of Independence are found Samuel Adams and John Adams. The name John Adams appears among those of a number of Presidents of the United States who have been of Welsh blood. On behalf of Rhode Island Stephen Hopkins signed the declaration. From Connecticut William Williams gave his signature. Both of those men were of Welsh blood.

To the first Continental Congress New York sent four delegates to pledge the adherence of that great State, and three of these were of either Welsh birth or descent. Then appearing from Pennsylvania was that fine man, Robert Morris, who came from Wales when a child, and thereafter settled in Philadelphia. At the time of his election as a Member of the Continental Congress he was recognized as the ablest financier in the United States. Robert Morris freely and generously advanced to the sacred cause of the American Revolution his entire fortune, and with it supported the cause of American liberty.

Francis Hopkinson, of Welsh descent, became a lawyer of high standing. He was a Member of the Continental Congress from New Jersey. He is also known as the author of "Hail, Columbia," that song of America which so well gives voice to our national pride. Button Gwinnett, a native of Wales, was the delegate from Georgia to the Continental Congress. He also was a signer of the Declaration of Independence, and afterwards became Governor of Georgia. Another signer of the Declaration of Independence was Richard Henry Lee, of Welsh descent, who was also a Member of the Continental Congress, and who introduced therein the resolution which declared that the American colonies were free and independent. Soon thereafter he occupied the high office of United States Senator.

It is interesting to know that it took Thomas Jefferson, the author of the Declaration of Independence, but three weeks to draft and present that wonderful bill of rights, and it is further of interest to note that another man of Welsh blood, Gouverneur Morris, wrote out the first complete draft of the American Constitution.

And who, then, is able to measure the value or great worth of the services rendered by the learned John Marshall, who, as Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, aided by the noble ideals of human liberty attained by him by reason of his Welsh ancestry, was the first of the American judiciary to be called to the duty of wisely expounding and firmly establishing and clarifying the principles founded upon and declared in the American Constitution, and of the statutes of Congress then and thereafter enacted under it?

Daniel Webster was for 40 years the most brilliant personality in American political life. He was the greatest orator of his time and a great statesman. His masterly expositions of the American Constitution prepared the North to defend the Union at all costs. His imperishable sence, "Liberty and Union, now and forever, one and inseparable," became Lincoln's text. Daniel Webster, through his mother, was of Welsh blood.

In order to note how the principles of human liberty, now so firmly fixed by the Declaration of Independence and in the Constitution of the United States, reflect back and appear to have obtained their equitable quality from the laws and political principles of ancient Wales, attention should be given the fact that centuries ago Alfred the Great procured to be made for use with the laws of England a translation of the ancient laws of Dyfnwal Moelmud, King of Britain, and the laws of Marsia, Queen of Britain, and that those laws were translated from Welsh into Latin and thereafter into Saxon for such use. Thus we see that the spirit of the laws of ancient Wales has been reflected eastward into the boundaries of England, and thereafter westward into this great land of liberty.

On the walls of Rhuddlan Castle, which brings to mind the Statute of Rhuddlan—the first portion of the British constitution—there is engraved upon a huge stone of the castle the following declaration: "This fragment is the remains where King Edward the First held his Parliament, A. D. 1283, in which the Statute of Rhuddlan was enacted, securing to the Principality of Wales its judicial rights and independence."

The independence of Wales! What a noble declaration! A historian worthy of great respect has spoken of Henry VII, born in 1456, the first of the Welsh Kings of Tudor, as being "Henry the Seventh, a Welshman, leading a Welsh army, who had now become King of England." Does any Welshman claim, then, that the Welsh conquered the land within the boundaries of England? If the claim be that by the absorption of the kingly power through a change in the national blood of the ruler a nation becomes conquered, then the answer might be "yes." If the answer be "no," where, then, is the basis for any man to challenge the claim of the Welshman that Wales has never been conquered? Does not the stone of Rhuddlan declare the existence of the independence of Wales and declare the guaranty of its judicial rights?

Does not the Magna Charta declare that the liberties of Wales shall remain inviolate? Have not the Welsh at all times retained their language, their laws, and their nation against all vicissitudes? Has there been anything different from a mere joining of one state with another state, both guaranteeing the safety of each other in time of war, a matter in the political life of a nation with which we in America are perfectly familiar. Has not the greatest living authority upon such questions in Great Britain only recently declared the fact to be that the island of Great Britain is a portion of one of the greatest democracies on earth to-day?

How important in the development of the United States has been the railroad. No forts nor battleships were ever more important to this great Nation than the railroads as instruments of governmental administration and as a guaranty of national security in time of war, and of prosperity to the people in time of peace. The first railroad locomotive was the invention in America of Oliver Evans, a man of Welsh blood, and the first operating railroad, as railroads are now known, was constructed and placed in operation at Merthyr Tydvil, Glamorganshire, Wales, by Trevithick and Vivian. The plans for the locomotive to operate upon this railroad had theretofore been sent from America by the first named, Oliver Evans. At a period many years later George Stephenson, profiting by the demonstration of a successfully operating railroad constructed by those men, and by its example, built in England a railroad having a somewhat larger locomotive. America should be grateful, and doubtless is, to Oliver Evans and to Trevithick and Vivian, who pioneered and showed the way.

Brief reference may be made to the voyage of Prince Madoc and his brave companions toward the discovery of America at a time long antedating the voyage of Columbus. We may and do take pleasure, however, in contemplating the valuable services rendered by that early explorer, Meriwether Lewis, he of Welsh blood, who, accompanied by his companion Clark, sought out and aimed to make clear the unexplored portions of this country toward the great Northwest and Oregon. The work accomplished by this noted explorer had its value in operating toward a binding together with the eastern portion of the territory of this Nation of the far western portion, at a time when the result of such explorations operated as a factor of great political force toward rendering and causing this land to be included within the present vast boundaries of this Nation.

Who is it that is unfamiliar with the great African explorer, Henry Morton Stanley, who, when born in Wales, was given the name of John Rowlands, and thereafter, out of gratitude, assumed the name of his kind foster father? Stanley was the last explorer of the dark and hidden portions of this sphere.

Of the Presidents of the United States nine have been of Welsh ancestry—Jefferson, John Adams, Monroe, Madison, John Quincy Adams, William Henry Harrison, Lincoln, Garfield, and Benjamin Harrison. And in this day in the Cabinet of President Harding two men of Welsh ancestry hold high positions—Charles Evans Hughes, our Secretary of State, and James J. Davis, our Secretary of Labor.

Is it possible to know to what extent the mind of the great Shakespeare had gained much of its strength and vigor by reason of the Welsh blood which came to him through his Welsh grandmother, Alice Griffin? It is known that not only he had his Welsh blood but also enjoyed the pleasant companionship of his Welsh cousins.

From what other source does there come to us such beautiful stories of romance and chivalry as from the stories of King Arthur and his brave knights, and for how many centuries has that romantic history continued to furnish a never-ending storehouse from which the finest poets and dramatists of the Continent of Europe, and those of parts of Britain, have taken inspiration toward their finer literary efforts?

That grand poet John Milton was of Cambrian blood, through his Welsh mother, Sarah Castor.

When it became necessary that Napoleon be humbled and there was a call for a great soldier to break the sword of the French general and cast it into the dust, a man who carried in his veins Welsh blood was called for the accomplishment of that difficult undertaking. The able Duke of Wellington, on his mother's side, came from the Welsh family of Sir John Trevor.

During our Civil War the existence of the Union was threatened and the life of the Nation was in deadly peril. Time passed and the life of the British Empire was threatened by those great northern hordes which had theretofore threatened and accomplished the ruin and destruction of the ancient Roman Empire. In these later times, when each of those nations so greatly depended upon one particular strong heart and indomitable will to conquer, there was called a man of Welsh blood to bear aloft the sword of victory unto its glorious end. To the immortal Lincoln was intrusted the solemn duty of saving this great Republic and safeguarding the liberties of the Nation. And how well his Welsh blood added strength toward the noble qualities of firmness, charity, benevolence, and indomitable will to conquer. Long shall this Nation revere his memory and respect his great work.

Puny, indeed, was the power of the great Napoleon, and lacking in its permanent accomplishments, when compared with the power wielded by that greatest of all British Premiers when he who in his youth had been a Welsh boy of modest station in life was by a nation then in its most desperate peril called to bear aloft the sword of Britain and chosen to become the preserver of their liberties.

All acclaim to that true Welshman, David Lloyd George, he of absolutely unconquerable courage of heart and mind, and in character displaying the fine qualities of our Washington and Lincoln. He, that brave and gallant Welshman, who has saved the liberties of his beloved Welsh nation and at the same time the liberties of the confederated free nations bound up in the British Empire.

How well we are entitled to reflect upon the fine quality of good Welsh characteristics as they were shown by that brave prince Owen Glendower. The great Glendower showed the warm, mystical, idealistic, and poetical side of the Welsh mind, and he loved the freedom of his Welsh mountains. In 1415, shortly before the Battle of Agincourt, and also after that battle, Henry V desired his commissioner to negotiate with those kinsmen close to Owen Glendower, with a view of the pacification of the Welsh leader and of his followers. But nothing came of it, for Glendower was resolved to live and die free rather than bow to any man. Shakespeare has beautifully said of him and of his character:

"In faith, he is a worthy gentleman,
Exceedingly well read, and profited
In strange concealments,
Valiant as a lion,
And wondrous affable, and as bountiful
As mines in India."

Not Greece nor Rome in their brightest or palmiest days had produced patriots more heroically devoted to the liberty of their country and the maintenance of their nation than were the men of Wales.

Cymru fu, Cymru fydd,
Tra mor, tra Brython.

[The foregoing, the Fairmount speech, was delivered by J. Charles Jones, at San Francisco, on St. David's Day, March 1, at a meeting of the Cymmrodorion Soicety.]

A well-known historian has given the following beautiful description of the Welsh as they appeared centuries ago:

"The Brythons, like the Gauls, were men of much physical beauty. Tall, clean-shaven, save for long moustaches, with clear red and white complexions and hair of yellow or golden brown, which they sometimes attempted to improve with dye, dressed in the characteristic Gallic breeches, with a bright-colored sleeved tunic and a woolen cloak, frequently of red or crimson, sometimes intricately decorated with a checkered pattern, and fastened at the throat with bronze or gold brooches of most beautiful design; with torques of gold about their necks and golden bracelets on their arms, the British warriors appeared indeed to belong to a noble race."

Centuries of warfare passed and peace then became more evident. The following has been written of the changed conditions in Wales:

"The castles have gone. No longer do men at arms walk the castle wards, or archers shape their arrows in the tower chambers; life no longer clings around the castle wall; princes no longer lead the Welsh to battle. But the Welsh nation is still a nation; the Welsh language is still a living means of intercourse; Welsh characteristics have proved stronger than the conqueror of Norman castles—time."

The Statute of Rhuddlan constitutes the first written portion of the constitution of Great Britain and is dated 1276, signed by the Prince of Wales on November 19 and by the King of England on November 20. It appears to have been a treaty by which two free nations, Wales and England, endeavored to unite into one government. Centuries of warfare followed thereafter; and when the final joining of those two free nations into Great Britain became physically a fact, the birth of Great Britain and of the constitution thereof each hark back to that day of the treaty at Rhuddlan Castle, at which time both Great Britain and its constitution first came into existence. These two important things had their first existence not in England but in the country of Wales.

The Welsh have an interesting saying: "He who would King of England be, must first be Prince of Wales."

At the Battle of Waterloo the two generals of the army of Great Britain in high command were General Picton and General Wellesley (later Duke of Wellington). General Picton was Welsh, having his home then in Wales, and the Duke of Wellington was of Welsh blood, through his mother, who came from the Welsh family of Sir John Trevor.

Among the signers of the Declaration of Independence being of Welsh blood were the following: Thomas Jefferson, Benjamin Harrison, Samuel Adams, John Adams, Francis Lewis, Stephen Hopkins, William Williams, Francis Hopkinson, John Morton, John Penn, Arthur Middleton, Button Gwinnett, Richard Henry Lee, Francis Lightfoot Lee, Lewis Morris, Robert Morris, William Floyd.

Maj. Gen. Charles Lee was a Welshman from Wales. From the family of Lee came Richard Henry Lee, Francis Lightfoot Lee, Arthur Lee, and "Lighthorse Harry" Lee. The last-named Lee was the father of Gen. Robert E. Lee, of the Civil War.

William Penn, the founder of Pennsylvania, came of a Welsh family. The name of his grandfather was John Tudor, who was also called John Penmynydd (top of the mountain). The first portion "Pen" of that name continued, and was passed along to his descendant, William Penn, of Pennsylvania.

William H. Seward, Secretary of State in the Cabinet of Lincoln during the Civil War, was of Welsh descent.

The first newspaper published in America (1679) was published by Benjamin Harris, a Welshman.

The two great American Universities, Yale and Harvard, were each founded by a man of Welsh blood. Yale was founded by the Welshman Elihu Yale, and Harvard by John Harvard, who was of Welsh descent.

Robert Morris advanced to the American Government as a loan money amounting to several millions, with which the expense of the Revolutionary War was borne. None of this money, which the Government has up to this time regarded as a permanent loan, has ever been repaid to Morris or his heirs, several of whom are now residing in this country.

President Monroe was of Welsh blood, through his mother.

President Madison was of Welsh blood, through his father.

The Welsh name Madison is equal to the Welsh name Matthews, which name also has the variants of Maddeson and Madison.

President Lincoln was of Welsh blood, through the family of his mother.

Many persons in the United States appear as descendants of Jonathan Edwards (born 1720), a Welshman then of high standing as a minister of the gospel in the United States. Of 1,394 of these descendants, 13 became university presidents; 123 became college and university professors; 32 became eminent authors; 96 became physicians; more than 200 became ministers of the gospel; 400 were successful business men; 1 became Vice President of the United States; and many others of them were mayors of large American cities, United States Senators and Congressmen, and officials in the Diplomatic Service of the United States.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma obtained the floor.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I offer an amendment to the pending bill and ask to have it stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 32 it is proposed to strike out lines 5 to 20, both inclusive, in the following words:

DEPORTATION OF ALIEN COMMUNISTS

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a letter from the Commissioner of Immigration of the Boston district dealing with the difficulties encountered by the immigration department in deporting alien communists be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONER,
East Boston, Mass., March 2, 1932.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am deeply interested in the bill introduced into the Congress known as H. R. 8549, to make it a crime to advocate or promote the overthrow or destruction of the Government of the United States by force or violence, and for other purposes.

The communists are very active in New England at the present time. Undoubtedly because we are so highly industrial they can reach thousands of workers in a comparatively small area. We have deported so many alien communists the leaders of the party have now issued instructions to all the comrades not to answer any question put to them by immigration officials. Consequently they now refuse to answer questions as to citizenship, place of birth, entry into the United States, or to give any information which will enable the immigration officials to determine whether or not they are aliens and subject to deportation. You can readily understand, therefore, how difficult it is to handle these cases. If we do secure sufficient evidence in regard to their communistic activities as to warrant deportation proceedings, the fact that they refuse to give us information as to place of birth defeats deportation.

Recently several alien communists under warrant of arrest have claimed they were born in Russia. Even though we doubt the truth of this statement we have no means of disproving it, and after warrant of deportation has been issued we are obliged to release them on their own recognizance, because having no diplomatic relations with Russia we are unable to deport them. This means that though we have proved they are working for the overthrow of our Government they are free to resume their communistic activities. I think you will agree with me that this is a very difficult and unsatisfactory situation.

In cases of this kind the bill known as H. R. 8549 would enable us to convict these alien communists of the crime set forth in this bill and send them to prison. It would remove them for the time being, at least, from the possibility of continuing their activities. Furthermore, it would enable us to take action against foreign-born communists who have become naturalized and are thereby beyond the jurisdiction of the deportation law.

I do not need to remind you of the growing menace of communism to our Nation. My work as commissioner for the New England district has shown me the seriousness of the situation. I feel very strongly that something must be done to counteract this movement if we are to preserve our Government and the ideals and institutions which have made our Nation the envy of the world.

I sincerely hope, therefore, that you will use your influence to secure the passage of H. R. 8549.

Sincerely yours,

ANNA C. TILLINGHAST,
Commissioner of Immigration, Boston District.

DEPORTATION—SUGGESTIONS TO WORKERS

(Issued by the International Labor Defense)

Aliens: An alien is a person who was not born in the United States and who has not become a naturalized citizen by obtaining citizenship papers.

Deportation not a punishment for crime: Deportation is a proceeding by the Department of Labor to return aliens from the United States to their native countries when the Government has declared them to be undesirable. The purpose of deportation proceedings is to send alien workers out of the United States, and not to jails within the country. Deportation is a weapon of the bosses to try to weaken the strength of the militant working class.

Don't talk when arrested: In any event, whether you are arrested with or without a warrant of arrest, do not answer any questions put to you by the inspector, except to give your name. Do not give the inspector your address. Do not give him any information as to the time, place, or manner in which you entered the United States.

Do not enter into any discussion with the inspector who arrests you. The Government seldom has much information about a worker when a deportation proceeding starts, but usually obtains enough information when a worker talks freely with an inspector. In many instances the alien worker has lost his case by loose talking before his hearing.

While you are in jail awaiting trial or serving sentence for a "criminal" offense an immigration inspector may visit you and ask you questions about your right to be in the country. Don't answer his questions.

Don't give information about other workers: The immigration inspector may attempt to obtain information from you about other alien workers. Do not give him any information about other workers or your union headquarters.

Refuse to answer such questions as: "Where did you obtain this literature?" "What do you know about him?"

Right to have lawyer: You are entitled to be represented by a lawyer. In deportation cases you should demand a lawyer. When he comes give him all the facts as well as any possible reasons that you may know for your arrest.

Deportation hearings are private: Deportation hearings are held in private. The only people present in the room are the commissioners, the stenographer, the alien, and the alien's lawyer. Workers are not present. The testimony is secret and is not given to the newspapers. Don't try to propagandize the Government officials at such a hearing. You will only be talking yourself into a swift deportation.

Party membership: If you are questioned concerning party membership or the character of any party, you should be guided by your party instructions.

Naturalization: Before applying for citizenship papers always consult your organizer, who will be furnished with additional information on this subject.

For more information write to International Labor Defense, Boston district (New England) office, 113 Dudley Street, room 6, Boston, Mass., or International Labor Defense, Rhode Island office, 150 Main Street, room 109, Pawtucket, R. I.

THE NEW YORK STOCK EXCHANGE

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred a letter by Charles Forney, addressed to the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the honorable COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY,
Senate of the United States.

HONORABLE SIRS: This presentation relates to the practices of "New York Stock Exchange" and as being generally the practice of all stock exchanges.

I

The New York Stock Exchange as such is an abstraction and a name and not an entity. It owns no property, is not incorporated, is not a person nor a firm nor a corporation, and can neither sue nor be sued.

"New York Stock Exchange" is a name or an alias assumed by a group of 1,275 "members" and in law does not have the standing nor the responsibility of any tangible identifiable thing known to human conception.

The "members" are admitted to a room in New York City, and admittance or refusal of admittance to that room as may be dictated by a committee is the sole control and the only means available for enforcement of any dictum adopted by those in the room, and the ability to enter that room is what constitutes the person having that recognized ability a "member" of "New York Stock Exchange."

Being a "member of New York Stock Exchange" is worth from a past $600,000 for a "seat in that room" to a present about $175,000.

There is a list of the names of the persons deemed to have a right to enter that room, and the sole and only deprivation suffered by an offender is the striking of the offender's name from the list.

A person whose name has been stricken from the list does not lose his "seat in the room" but only the right to go into the room, and the "seat" can be and in practice is sold to some one else passed upon and approved by a committee appointed for that purpose.

There are no 1,275 men in the world who as to the machinery of their business and the operation thereof have to possess comparable mental agility, sagacity, and alertness as the price of continuance.

In ancient times in wrestling there were Greco-Roman rules and what was known to the vulgar as "che sara sara" and among the Normans as "chacun tire de son cote," or as we express it, "catch as catch can," or the "devil take the hindmost."

The New York Stock Exchange is operated "che sara sara," and this applies to the relation between the "members" as to each thereof and in turn with the public.

II

The building on which in New York is engraved "New York Stock Exchange" is owned, together with the fee to appurtenant real estate, by "New York Stock Exchange Building Co.," a New York corporation, whose president is Warren B. Nash.

"The New York Stock Exchange Safe Deposit Co." is a New York corporation whose president is E. H. H. Simmons.

Neither of these two corporations engages in any activity of interest to the Congress.

III

"The members" are dominated by 27 of their members headed by J. P. Morgan, and including Otto H. Kahn and others, who gave false testimony before the Senate Finance Committee under Senate Resolution 19, control being exercised through "influence" with the Federal reserve, five national banks in New York City having "deposits" of $4,053,101,608 and five trust companies organized under the law of New York having "deposits" of $3,664,190,000, whose loans to "members of New York Stock Exchange" alone make possible practices reviewed herein.

IV

Richard Whitney, "president" of "New York Stock Exchange," is an employee of and directed by J. P. Morgan & Co. and draws no salary from the exchange.

V

The law of 29 States is daily violated by men who are members of "New York Stock Exchange," but so thoroughly have the tentacles of the cancer penetrated into the executive departments of government under this Union that enforcement of law has ceased with relation thereto.

Twenty-nine States have by due enactment of so-called "blue sky acts" defined fraud in the sale of securities and have provided among other "penalties" that recission of a sale can be duly effected and that the seller must give back the money paid for a security so sold.

Yet when after the most painstaking labor the needle is found in the haystack there is no point to it because the violation becomes the violation of New York Stock Exchange and there is no entity which can sue or be sued. After filing suit and the assumption of jurisdiction by authority which believed it was pursuing something other than an alias and the issuance of an order to New York Stock Exchange to respond and answer all according to law the response is a nice long letter to Corporation Commission of Virginia signed Richard Whitney, president of New York Stock Exchange, stating that New York Stock Exchange can not appear because it does not exist. That does not quote Mr. Whitney, but the most tangible thing about the 4-page letter is that it was signed in ink and otherwise it is a masterpiece of words which by transmutation become converted to zero, and in effect might as well be in invisible ink.

It is not in the public interest to have laws in 29 States which are relied on by the public as rules of conduct, but which, in fact, are merely window dressing to cause the public to enter a "Che sara sara" contest guided by what it believes to be rules.

In any case the States have delegated to the United States their power to police their borders and prevent from outside the State violation of the law of the State through invasions, through the United States mails, the telegraph, the telephone, the wireless, and by airplanes, all under control of the United States.

The Associated Press and the New York Times openly scoff in Washington dispatches at there being any possibility of being able to muster enough votes for remedial legislation affecting said practice, and by innuendo imply and almost openly charge that more than a majority of the Members of the Senate and of the House are under the spell of bribery exercised by "members" of the "exchange" and that so many Members of the Congress of the United States "play the market" as to make enactment of adequate remedial legislation impossible.

VI

Mr. Richard Whitney, acting as J. P. Morgan's mouthpiece, is reported to have stated before a House committee that he had been advised by counsel that pending measures under discussion at hearing before the House committee are unconstitutional.

VII

This from an aggregation of 1,275 men who under their aliases own no property, have no property rights, no vested rights, and under their aliases connive with lawyers to be without and above the law where possible and otherwise——otherwise.

The Constitution of the United States is an agreement by and among citizens of the United States to mutually observe rules of conduct and to mutually protect each other, and an abstraction not amenable to the observances has no earned right of protection.

Mr. Whitney's pronouncement, therefore, is the impudent pronouncement of lawless defiance announcing that if bribery, cajolement, artifice, fraud, and fraudulent misrepresentation cease to be potent to preserve lawless special privilege and law violation and evasion of law, then the law will be appealed to to sustain that which has failed otherwise to be sustained and has only been sustained in any case by evasion, bribery, cajolement, artifice, fraud, and fraudulent misrepresentation.

To say that over "selling" of shares or pretended sales of nonexistent stock pretended to be out of a given known quantity of shares is the same as selling wheat, the total quantity in existence not being sworn to by controlling authority, is to compare dissimilar circumstance.

There is no honesty in an attempt to place on comparable parity sales of wheat and sales of shares of stock, nor to justify the latter by the former.

That pretense falls further when it is considered that if it were known that wheat was being grown in Mars to be dumped onto the American market or to fall off into space according to the direction of the wind trading in wheat would be absolute gamble.

If it were not believed that the sworn-to statements of United States Steel Corporation as to the number of shares of its capital stock are true, then, of course, trading in United States Steel would be absolute gambling and legislation, if considered, would have to be according.

No one alleges the reported number of shares of stock is falsely reported in listing, and gambling in listed shares is denied.

VIII

Any person intelligently desiring to invest money in the shares of stock of a corporation would require certain information.

As a prerequisite to "listing" on New York Stock Exchange such information includes the number of shares into which the capital stock of a corporation is divided.

Assume Union Pacific Railroad has 100 miles of track, no debt, and 100 shares of stock, obviously there would be 1 share per mile of track, and an investor's judgment would be based accordingly.

It is begging the question to say no investor knows anything about the length of the railroad and bases purchase on earnings, in turn in part dependent on some facts which are considered.

Not even in shooting craps is it entirely "eeny meeny miny mo," and if transactions running into billions of dollars are alleged to be beyond even the calculations possible to permutations and combinations and were known so to be, then different remedial legislation would have to be considered than that based on vociferously repeated and generally accepted protestations.

To maintain (possibly only a fiction) a reasonable premise it must be assumed that trades on stock exchanges are premised on believed quantities.

IX

If the officials of Union Pacific Railroad increased the number of shares outstanding from 100 to 1,000 by merely signing additional certificates and fed out the additional shares to persons believing they were buying part of 100 shares and ignorant of the fact they were buying part of 1,000 shares, it would be fraudulent.

The appearance of the extra 900 shares, being a greater quantity in supply than required by demand, would depress the price.

By buying back the 900 shares (fed out at the price established by belief there were 100 shares) at the lower price, the profit accruing to the officials would be a dishonest and indefensible profit.

Following the argument of Mr. Richard Whitney, those officials would say the market price was too high and the issuance of the additional certificates was to cushion the market against a decline by holding the price down.

It is no defense to say the public makes the profit or takes the loss from a practice which results in hereafter-shown violation of existing law.

X

(1) No trades in stock on any exchange relate to other than shares of stock of corporations.

(2) Corporations are created and exist only by operation of law.

(3) Every authority creating a corporation prescribes the amount of capital stock and/or the number of shares thereof to be issued.

(4) All tax for the right to be a corporation and annual franchise tax is based and/or computed on the amount of capital stock and/or the number of shares thereof.

(5) No authority permits the issuance of certificates representing the ownership of shares of the capital stock to "bearer," and so to permit would defeat the requirement of law as to the giving of notice to stockholders of annual meetings and other notice of corporate proceedings.

(6) The United States and some States under the Union derive revenue from a tax on the transfer of ownership of stock and a tax on the income from stock.

For a corporation to issue "bearer" shares would prevent ascertainment of ownership against which tax returns can be checked and the tax on transfers would be legally avoidable.

XI

"Short sales" of stock, or over the amount of stock actually in existence is in evasion of matters related in 3, 4, 5, 6 of paragraph X hereof.

XII

For the four years 1928, 1929, 1930, 1931 the Government of the United States alone should have collected on stock transfers on a total of 3,432,931,700 shares transactions on New York Stock Exchange, or a total of $68,658,634, from stock transactions on New York Stock Exchange alone, to say nothing of the other 33 stock exchanges in the United States, whereas by the device known as "short selling" the United States Government was defrauded to an extent which can be ascertained by this committee, and the fraud on the revenue of the several States can similarly be ascertained.

The Bureau of Internal Revenue maintains a force of inspectors to check stock-transfer books and see that stamps are affixed which boots little and is a waste of money while transfers are made in avoidance of the books.

XIII

The fraud is effected by "members" of the New York Stock Exchange having a certificate issued in the name of a clerk, who signs his name on the back of the certificate. Such certificate then represents a "bearer" owned number of shares passing from hand to hand without transfer on the books of the issuing corporation. The tax is paid only on transfers shown on the books of the issuer.

"Bearer" shares when stolen impose a burden on the police department and increase the cost of government, and being "bearer" shares, encourage stealing, against which costly insurance is carried at the public's expense.

XIV

There are 33 "stock exchanges" in the United States, whose "members" similarly evade the payment of said tax, etc. A list of exchanges and their location is attached hereto as Exhibit A.

XV

For the consideration of this honorable committee there is presented herewith a list of 57 corporations.

Transactions reported as "sales" on New York Stock Exchange in 1931 show the ownership of these corporations changed hands severally from more than one in the year to every two weeks in the year.

There is almost as fast as property changed ownership in the celebrated English case of Jarndyce v. Jarndyce and would require a new rule in Shelly's case.

In the case of Bethlehem Steel Corporation, its entire capital stock is pretended to have changed hands twice in 1931, yet Mr. Grace was not disturbed by the new owners and Mr. Schwab retained the chairmanship of the board, and probably not even the office cat was disturbed out of its chair.

It may be news to the employees and to Mr. Swope, but according to the New York Stock Exchange, Westinghouse had a new set of owners every three months in 1931.

The purchasers of farm implements made by J. I. Case & Co. and sold on the installment plan to our sore-pressed farmers would have been puzzled had they known that a new group of owners had taken over and given up and another group gone in and taken charge of the business and the installment notes seven times in 1931.

The ink scarce could have been dry on notices of annual meeting of Worthington Pump & Machinery Corporation when they had to be rewritten to another group of owners, as that corporation had new owners every two weeks of 1931, according to New York Stock Exchange.

This presentation would be unduly burdened by a list of the corporations whose ownership changed less than 100 per cent during 1931 but more than 50 per cent.

If the farmers of the country swapped farms every two weeks, there would not be enough food produced in this country to feed even the 1,275 "members" of the New York Stock Exchange.

Your petitioner moving respectfully takes the liberty of presenting for the consideration of this honorable committee the following:

"A bill to regulate the sale of any share of the capital stock of any corporation engaged in or whose product moves in interstate commerce and to prohibit any sale of any such share in excess of the number of shares of stock of such corporation as authorized by the articles of incorporation or charter of such corporation

"Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter it shall be unlawful for any person within the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction of the United States to sell, offer to sell, or quote a price as an offer to sell any share of the capital stock of any corporation engaged in or whose product moves in interstate commerce in excess of the number of shares of stock of such corporation as authorized by its articles of incorporation or charter.

"Any offer to sell a share of stock of such corporation for which duly issued certificate of ownership of such share is not in the possession of the person making such offer or on whose behalf such offer is made shall be conclusively presumed to be an offer in excess of such said number of shares.

"That hereafter it shall be unlawful to transfer by any device whatsoever ownership of a share of stock of such a corporation unless and until transfer of ownership thereof has been duly effected on the corporate records of the issuer corporation and payment of stock-transfer tax imposed by law has been duly effected.

"Any person violating or participating in violating the provisions of this act shall upon conviction thereof be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than five years or both.

"As used in this act the term 'person' includes individual, partnership, corporation, or association."

XVIII

For the convenience of this honorable committee your petitioner presents herewith and marked "Exhibit B," a list of the hereinbefore listed corporations showing the address of the general office thereof to which inquiry, as to the number of certificates issued in 1931 in transfers of ownership of shares of stock thereof and the number of shares total transferred in ownership on the books and the amount of tax paid on such transfer could be made.

Your petitioner, in respectful address, takes the liberty of offering the form of such inquiry to elicit the information to this honorable committee, as shown on Exhibit C hereof.

XIX

Fifty-seven issues totaled transactions of 227,183,130 shares, as against 349,582,282 shares in 1,167 issues.

Mr. Whitney claims the New York Stock Exchange would have to close if "short sales" in the 57 issues were discontinued.

The 1,275 brokers ought to be able to live off the $8,750,000 commissions from sales of 349,582,282 shares in supposedly bona fide transactions, being an average in commissions of $70,000 a year apiece on a total of 349,582,282 shares. Why do they think they earn more and for doing what for this country out of which they get their living and whose citizens afford protection to them?

The commissions would be reduced from $113,000 to $70,000 apiece by elimination of fictitious transactions is no argument against putting stamps on stock transfers as required by law nor an excuse for defrauding the United States Government.

XX

The functioning of New York Stock Exchange either is performance of a useful service in the public interest on which has become attached chicanery, fraud, and violation of law or the useful service is mere window dressing as a screen to cover rascality.

There can be no honest defense of chicanery, fraud, and violation of law, and if Mr. Richard Whitney or anyone else objects to the Congress moving in protection of the revenue of the Government of the United States such objections are in support of chicanery, fraud, and violation of law and should be appraised accordingly.

Defrauding the Government of revenue from transfer of ownership of shares of stock and deliberate evasion of law of 29 helpless States and violation of the corporation charter intended requirements of 48 States is indefensible under any honest intention.

All of which is respectfully submitted and consigned to this honorable committee.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS' PROGRAM IN CHINA-JAPAN IMBROGLIO

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the proceedings of the most important session of the assembly of the League of Nations considering the Sino-Japanese imbroglio is reported in the New York Times of Saturday. I ask that the article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LEAGUE LAYS DOWN A 3-POINT PROGRAM FOR SHANGHAI PEACE—ASSEMBLY VOTES UNANIMOUSLY CESSATION OF WAR, JAPANESE WITHDRAWAL, AND PARLEY—TOKYO'S STAND OVERRULED—CHINESE CHARGE 35,000 MORE SOLDIERS ARE LANDED FOR CONTINUATION OF DRIVE—SOVIET NOW FEARS ATTACK—MOSCOW NEWSPAPER SAYS OFFICIAL OF JAPAN URGED FIGHT—HOSTILITIES NEAR SIBERIAN FRONTIER

FAR EAST DEVELOPMENT

Geneva: The League of Nations assembly voted unanimously yesterday for a resolution calling on Japan and China to cease hostilities at Shanghai and to negotiate for the withdrawal of Japanese troops.

Shanghai: Chinese officials charged that the Japanese landed 35,000 more soldiers 25 miles northwest of Shanghai and were fighting at Taitsang. False reports of a Chinese victory brought a threat of a communist uprising.

Moscow: Izvestia, the soviet newspaper, revealed that troops on the Siberian border were being increased because of Japanese threats in Manchuria. A Tokyo official was alleged to have urged war on the soviet.

Manchuria: Chinese soldiers revolted against the new régime of Gen. Ma Chen-shan in Heilungkiang Province. Japanese troops advanced nearer to the Siberian frontier in pursuit of insurgents.

LEAGUE VOTES CALL FOR PEACE

By Clarence K. Streit

GENEVA, March 4.—The League of Nations Assembly, with Japan's agreement, voted unanimously by roll call to-night a resolution calling for the unconditional withdrawal of Japanese forces from the Shanghai area.

This clean-cut victory on what Japan had for four hours bitterly fought for as an "essential" point was dramatically won for the league by the courage of three men, and of these three men alone. Their names, in the order in which they went to battle, are Paul Hymans, Foreign Minister of Belgium and president of the assembly; Giuseppe Motta, President of Switzerland; and Edouard Benes, Foreign Minister of Czechoslovakia.

Things came to a showdown. When they did these leaders of three small European countries—two of them landlocked and another that has abolished its navy—won more from Japanese diplomacy than all the great naval powers have won from it in five months. They were vigorously applauded by the others.

To M. Hymans goes the credit of calling a spade a spade by declaring the resolution's verbiage really meant an unconditional

Japanese withdrawal and of forcing a showdown by appealing to the 50 member states to support him in this when Japan demanded certain conditions as essential.

SILENCE ANSWERS PLEA AT FIRST

To M. Motta belongs the credit of breaking the deathly silence that for a long moment was the assembly's answer to M. Hymans's imploring appeal. That silence was such that when M. Motta rose a storm of applause rose spontaneously from most of the diplomats, although they are trained never to applaud. Quivering with emotion, M. Motta spoke briefly and strongly. He not only reinforced M. Hymans, but he raised the league's standard still higher. He asked Naotako Sato, the Japanese delegate, to accept the resolution as it stood, warning him that the assembly now had the power to adopt it without Japan's consent. When M. Motta sat down the diplomats applauded even more than before. And men shook hands with their nearest Swiss friends and congratulated them on having such a President.

To M. Benes belongs the credit of immediately rising and unequivocally backing M. Motta.

ASSEMBLY AGAIN SILENT

How courageous and how strong these two had been was then driven home, for of all these who had applauded them not one rose to follow suit. That deathly silence settled down again. But in it Mr. Sato apparently decided that when the world heard of this the world would stand with Messrs. Hymans, Motta, and Benes, and not sit speechless, like its diplomats there in the hall. Mr. Sato broke the second silence to renounce Japan's amendment and to tell Mr. Motta he would accept, although 10 minutes earlier he had said Japan could not possibly accept the resolution as it stood.

Two men out of 50 had stood up and had sufficed to make not merely a majority but unanimity.

Then spoke a great power. Sir John Simon, Foreign Minister of Great Britain, suggested that this unanimous consent to the resolution might be expressed by another silence. But M. Motta had made a lead and he kept to it. He had had enough of silence. He insisted on a roll call. M. Hymans welcomed the motion and gave the nail another blow by abruptly adjourning the assembly's general commission, in which all this had happened, and reconvoking it immediately as a plenary assembly.

NATIONS ARE PLACED ON RECORD

There, by a roll call, he at once made every league member present put himself indubitably on record for or against the resolution. The South African Union gave the first yes. The alphabet made every great power take a position definitely before it came to Japan's turn. With increasing tension Germany and Britain—a slight hesitation drove home the importance of Sir John's yes—France and Italy repeated the yes. And then Japan also repeated.

Only one man spoke in that plenary assembly before the roll call, and it was what he said that gave the greatest meaning to every note that followed. It was Dr. W. W. Yen, the Chinese delegate, and what he said was that China accepted the resolution on the understanding that it referred only to a truce parley and not to a round table—as Japan had sought to interpret it—and also "with the understanding which has been so spendidly emphasized by Messrs. Motta and Benes that no condition should be attached to the withdrawal of troops occupying the territory of an invaded country. We consider that members of the league can not be expected or asked to pay a price for the enforcement of the right of being protected against foreign aggression, which is a right guaranteed to every member of the league by the covenant."

The Sino-Japanese conflict has been distinguished by several meetings tense with emotion, but none, perhaps, as deeply moving as to-day's. For four hours it rose steadily to the climax of that yes from Japan.

AMERICANS PRESENT AS SPECTATORS

In it the United States played the rôle of silent spectator. Its armament delegates were all there except Hugh Gibson and had ringside seats, along with Karl Radek and other members of the soviet delegation.

The assembly's general commission, in which all league members were represented, began its session in the league's new house of glass built for the disarmament conference, at 4.15, still faced with the same problem that confronted the assembly yesterday. Was the Shanghai war off, as the Japanese proclaimed, or still on, as the Chinese insisted? These contradictions must be ended, M. Hymans declared strongly at the outset, and he summoned Tsuneo Matsudaira to explain for Japan. Mr. Matsudaira handed in a telegram saying that only skirmishing was going on, and this would not alter the attitude of the Japanese army, which had no intention of resuming the battle or advancing beyond its present position, "unless the Chinese army makes a real offensive."

YEN DEMANDS NEUTRAL REPORTS

Doctor Yen jumped to his feet, saying: "We do not expect you to believe our story of what is happening, nor do you expect me to believe the Japanese story," and proposing that "the assembly request four admirals in Shanghai—the British, American, French, and Italian—to ascertain whether hostilities really have ceased, and that it authorize them to see to it that these hostilities do cease and remain ceased" until an armistice definitely is concluded in the presence of the four admirals.

Sir Eric Drummond, the secretary general of the league, then said he already had asked his Shanghai consular committee to rush a report on what was happening, and suggested that the powers with military or naval attachés there supplement this with their reports.

Sir John Simon, Joseph Paul-Boncour, and Massimo Pilotti accepted the latter plan for Britain, France, and Italy. It is quite different from Doctor Yen's proposal. It is a resurrection of the old arrangement in Manchuria, which there proved a slow and cumbersome way of providing the league with what driblets of information the big powers cared to give it. It really meant that the assembly would be dependent on Britain and France for military information, for Italy has never reported any to it nor has the United States.

JAPAN PLEDGES NO RESUMPTION

Mr. Matsudaira gave the task of defending Japan back to Mr. Sato. He assured the league, unqualifiedly, that "Japan never again would resume fighting which had been effectively ended by orders of the Japanese high command," and then admitted there still was fighting, but he "hoped" it was merely skirmishing. He welcomed Sir Eric's proposal, but thought the question of separating the combatants ought to be left to direct parleys between the two forces.

It was the old basic difference—China demanding the intervention of third parties and Japan seeking to prevent this.

Vehemently Doctor Yen returned to the charge "sorry to have to ask you to take your eyes off the mirage conjured up by the Japanese delegate" and turn them on three telegrams he had just received from the front. Bulletin No. 1 said Japanese transports were pouring troops into a place near where the Woosung Forts were. Bulletin No. 2 said Japan had landed 35,000 troops with tanks and cavalry 40 kilometers west of Shanghai, "twice as far as Japan asked us to retire," while eight more transports entered the Yangtse to-day and "severe fighting" continued.

PREDICTS NEW OFFENSIVE

Bulletin No. 3 said, "Our regiments defending Woosung were killed to the last man rather than surrender. Foreign eyewitnesses saw our peasants being forced by the Japanese at the bayonet's point to throw the corpses of our soldiers into the river." The Japanese landed troops to-day at Pootung to strike at the Hangchow region, and their officers "make no secret that they intend to take the entire region between Shanghai and Nanking."

"There is my information," said Doctor Yen, "and so I must insist that you authorize the admirals who are the highest neutral military officers at Shanghai to see to it that the fighting ceases and stays ended, for at best conflict is liable to break out at any time between armies that already have been fighting bitterly for three weeks, and the present cessation is unilateral, not guaranteed."

Mr. Sato started to explain away the arrival of the transports amid an outburst of laughter from the crowd. Their raison d'être had gone, he said, and they would be sent back, but when and "just exactly how that is to be done I am unable to say at present," for all this must be settled on the spot. He denied none of the things Doctor Yen had just reported.

It was too much for M. Hymans, who said Doctor Yen had so accentuated the painful uncertainty that they must at once get down to stopping further bloodshed. So he suspended the meeting for half an hour so the steering committee could lay a definite proposal before them.

The half hour stretched into an hour and a half while the steering committee sought to get the resolution so worded as to save the face of the league and Japan. The bell rang and the crowd pressed back into the hall, where the resolution was read. It "called upon," it "requested," it "recommended."

JAPAN OFFERS "MODIFICATION"

Mr. Sato rose. Japan accepted the first two points, but there was a "modification" which Japan wished to make to the third one. In the French text he used it to read the assembly "recommends that negotiations be entered into by the Chinese and Japanese representatives, with the assistance of the military, naval, and civilian authorities of the powers mentioned above, for the conclusion of arrangements which shall render definite the cessation of hostilities and regulate the method of withdrawal of the Japanese forces." After the word "hostilities" Japan would add "and regulate the conditions and details concerning the withdrawal of the Japanese forces and the future situation of the Chinese forces." Mr. Sato made it appear as a small drafting correction.

Here M. Hymans sounded the alarm. Speaking in a strong voice, he declared there was a "vast difference" between regulating the method of the withdrawal and regulation of the withdrawal. The resolution meant, therefore, the technical details of the withdrawal, whereas the word "condition" might imply political conditions, and therefore it altogether changed the meaning of the text.

JAPANESE ENVOY CASUAL

Mr. Sato came back smooth and persuasive. He said the word "conditions" might be changed as long as conditions assuring Japanese security were really attached to the withdrawal.

Finding himself unsupported, M. Hymans wavered momentarily. Now, he said, there was perhaps only "a shade of difference," for perhaps the resolution implied what Mr. Sato wanted.

Sir John Simon sought to pour oil on the waters. He pointed out that the English text did not contain the word "methods" of withdrawal and that Japan could accept the English text and she would get all she really wanted.

Mr. Sato saw no difference between the English and French texts.

"The latest events," he said, "have been such that we wish the resolution to give us satisfaction, at all events up to a certain point. We do not expect all of our demands to be accepted by the assembly, but we do desire the assembly to give us satisfaction on this point—a point which we consider essential."

At this tense moment Arthur Henderson, who had been sitting throughout the meeting shadowed in the corner of the "elders' bench" on the presidential dais, apparently decided that was no place for the president of the disarmament conference. He quietly left the platform while Mr. Sato continued insisting.

HYMANS APPEALS FOR SUPPORT

Then M. Hymans, feeling he was out on the end of a limb, reminded the assembly there were 50 sovereign states present and appealed to them, with imploring voice and eyes, to speak their minds. Everyone looked at his neighbor or the floor. A despairing shrug of the shoulder by M. Paul-Boncour seemed to indicate that the president of the council and representatives of France thought nothing could be done but give in. Then M. Motta arose. "This is a very grave moment," he began, "I would make an ardent appeal to M. Sato and make it to him as my friend to accept the resolution just as it is."

He agreed that there was no difference between the French and English texts—the word "method" might be dropped from the French, but that modified nothing. What the bureau had in mind, he went on, was "a kind of preliminary application of Article XV of the covenant," and that article, he stressed, allowed them to pass a valid resolution without the consent of the two parties involved, although he was anxious that they be "not merely judicially but morally and totally unanimous."

INVIOLABILITY OF PRINCIPLE STRESSED

He concluded:

"What this resolution says is this: The principle of withdrawal of the Japanese troops must not be brought into question. Japan has declared she is ready to effect this withdrawal. China has demanded it as her natural right. As soon as you put the word 'conditions' in place of the word 'methods' or add the word 'conditions' to the word 'methods,' you are bringing into question the principle of Japanese withdrawal. Now this is not possible. I ask you, then, to vote for the resolution just as it stands."

M. Benes, who sat beside M. Motta, rose and declared: "It is essential that we here, and public opinion throughout the world, especially in the Far East, should know exactly what is meant by this document," and agreed absolutely with M. Motta.

M. Sato, after taking exception to the idea that the assembly could pass the resolution over Japan's protest, ended by saying that in view of the interpretation of the resolution by M. Hymans, "we can accept the text."

The battle was won, but Sir John Simon rose to suggest that they eliminate the word "methods" from the French text, as M. Motta had remarked might be done, and then let silence give consent.

"Very well," said M. Hymans, firmly, "but let it be remembered that M. Motta also said this has not changed the meaning."

"And," chimed in M. Motta, "I want a vote taken by each member giving his opinion, and not merely by silence."

And so the vote was taken.

TEXT OF THE RESOLUTION

GENEVA, March 4.—The following resolution was adopted to-day by the League of Nations Assembly:

"This assembly, recalling suggestions made by the council on February 29 and without prejudice to other measures envisaged therein—

"1. Calls upon the Governments of China and Japan immediately to take the measures necessary to insure that orders which, as it has been informed, have been issued by the military commanders on both sides for cessation of hostilities shall be made effective.

"2. Requests that other powers which have special interests in the Shanghai area inform the assembly of the manner in which the invitation set out on the previous paragraph has been executed.

"3. Recommends that negotiations be entered into by Chinese and Japanese representatives, with the assistance of the military, naval, and civilian authorities of the powers mentioned above, for conclusion of arrangements which shall make definite the cessation of hostilities and regulate withdrawal of the Japanese forces.

"The assembly will be glad to be kept informed by the powers mentioned above as to the development of these negotiations."

SENATOR FROM ALABAMA

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I contemplate a statement which may take a few minutes. I will not ask the Senator from Oklahoma to yield if he prefers to proceed at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS], who was in the Chamber a few moments ago and who probably has been called out temporarily, should have brought to his attention a matter which is of considerable interest to this body.

During the course of the last few months there has been much talk here and elsewhere of cooperation and of nonpartisan action touching emergency measures. It has always been the practice, in so far as I am informed, since the organization of the Senate of the United States, to treat contests over seats of Members of this body as affected by judicial consideration. No one who is familiar with the history of such controversies would claim that it has been possible always to free them from the influence of political bias or prejudice.

In the Birmingham Age-Herald of the 5th instant is an article from the pen of Mr. Russell Kent, which discusses a proceeding by the chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate, the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS], which it is thought he might desire to affirm or discredit.

It is recalled that in the contest case of Heflin against BANKHEAD, what purported to be a report by the chairman of the subcommittee, the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS], was published in the press before it had been submitted to the subcommittee. It was somewhat surprising to learn that before formal action was asked or sought by the subcommittee what may very properly be termed a political caucus was held in the home of the Senator from Delaware in which the advice of leaders of the regular faction, as we call it, was sought, and a decision reached which was subsequently, according to the press report to which I am referring, ratified by the subcommittee of the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

I will ask the privilege of reading a part of this article:

WASHINGTON, March 4.—The case of J. Thomas Heflin and his Republican friends against Senator JOHN H. BANKHEAD and Democrats of Alabama advanced farther on the political stage Friday when by a party vote of 3 to 2 the Senate subcommittee handling the Alabama senatorial contest voted approval of a recommendation that the election of 1930 be declared void because of irregularities. A minority report will be filed later contending BANKHEAD is entitled to retain his seat.

In voting approval of this recommendation, the three Republican members of the subcommittee, Senators HASTINGS, of Delaware, chairman; WATSON, of Indiana, Republican floor leader; and GLENN, of Illinois, merely ratified a decision reached at a secret meeting of Republican leaders of the Senate held last week at the apartment of HASTINGS.

At that meeting it is understood there were present a dozen of the Republican stalwarts. The entire matter was discussed in considerable detail, and Senator HASTINGS read to the gathering parts of his report, together with his recommendations, and it was agreed that the course therein should be followed.

Senator HASTINGS Friday confirmed to this correspondent the rumor that such a gathering had been held and that the report he submitted formally Friday was discussed and approved. He declined to name the list of guests beyond admitting that WATSON and GLENN were present, and said that there were "8 or 10 Republicans of the Senate" present.

HASTINGS said when asked by the writer about the rumored meeting that he had considered it desirable to lay the substance of his contemplated report in the Heflin-Bankhead case before some of his colleagues of the Senate and had invited them to his home for that purpose. Thus the action nominally taken by the Republican majority of the subcommittee Friday stands forth as a mere formal ratification of action agreed upon by them and other Republican Senators some days prior to the formal action and at a time when theoretically that part of the report dealing with oral testimony taken for the subcommittee in January at a hearing in Birmingham was in the hands of counsel for Senator BANKHEAD and former Senator Heflin for their comments before the report was to be completed.

The statement continues at some length. I do not choose to read the remainder of it.

The declaration contained in the article, which is supported in part at least by the facts, that the report framed by the chairman of the subcommittee was published before it had even been approved or considered by members of the subcommittee, is calculated to produce a conviction and conclusion that it is the policy of the subcommittee, and of the faction in the Senate which that subcommittee is presumed to represent, to determine the right to a seat in the Senate largely on the ground of partisan political advantage.

It is entirely true that Senators have the right to confer upon any subject that interests them, but it is rather surprising to me that no member of the group which is commonly known as progressives was invited into the conference, and that only so-called stand-pat Republicans were permitted to enter the holy of holies in which the right of a Member of this body to retain his seat was secretly decided and agreed upon.

It would be a bad thing for the Senate, bad for every group in it, bad for Democrats, bad for progressives, and bad for stand-patters as we term them, if the practice is resorted to and the policy acquiesced in of settling on political considerations these question which by every rule of right and reason are quasi judicial. The time may come, it probably will come, when the majority which now sits on the other side of the Chamber will be transferred to this side of the Chamber. I wish to give assurance now that so long as I occupy a position of responsibility here the precedent sought to be established in the Heflin-Bankhead contest case will not be followed by this side of the Chamber.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Inasmuch as I yielded to the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] I feel constrained to yield for a statement by the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, in the first place, it seems to me that I ought to be permitted to invite any of my colleagues to my house for dinner without criticism. It also seems to me that I ought to be permitted to select my own company. I do not know how the distinguished Senator from Arkansas gets the impression that no progressives were invited and no Democrats were invited. I think he is assuming that to be true.

I do not know whether it is true or not, but it was generally rumored at the beginning of this Congress, when some question was being raised about whether opposition would be made to the present incumbent, the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], taking his seat, that the Democrats under the leadership of the Senator from Arkansas held a conference with respect to it and all decided to vote to seat him regardless of what might ultimately be done.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. There is no authority whatever for that statement. The question of how Members on this side of the Chamber will vote in the contest case has never been discussed in a Democratic conference.

Mr. HASTINGS. All right. I am just reporting a rumor which the distinguished Senator says is untrue, and that ends that.

That has no reference to what I did with respect to this report. I submit that there was nothing improper in what I did. I have been working on this matter for more than a year. I had thrown on my desk 3,126 pages of testimony. It became my duty to analyze it. I analyzed the reports that were made by the supervisors of some two thousand and odd districts in the State of Alabama. I had collected all kinds of testimony with respect to violations of the law in Alabama. I had put that in the form of a report. Nobody had seen it. My associates on the subcommittee had not seen it and had not heard it. They had not done a great amount of work in connection with it.

I was not certain that during this investigation, talking to myself as one might say, I had not reached some false conclusion with respect to it. I was anxious to lay the whole matter before some persons on whose judgment I was willing to rely, to inquire of them whether or not in their judgment the facts disclosed by the report justified the conclusion which I reached. When I read it to them and gave them the facts I found that, without any dissenting vote or without any dissenting voice, they all agreed that the facts disclosed by that report were shocking facts, and that under it, without any appearance of partisanship, no person could read the report and reach any other conclusion than that which I reached. That was the only purpose of getting their opinion with respect to it, merely because I was not certain, because I had worked on it such a long time and because I had given so much attention to it, whether or not under all the circumstances it might have been possible for me to have reached a false conclusion. If there is anything improper about it, if the distinguished Senator on the other side of the aisle can make anything improper out of it, I am perfectly willing he should do so.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. HASTINGS. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator has said that the fact that no Democrat or progressive Republican was invited to the conference was a mere assumption on my part, and there was a plain implication that the assumption was erroneous. I wonder if it would embarrass the Senator to tell us just exactly who was in the conference?

Mr. HASTINGS. I do not propose to give the names of either my men guests or my lady guests on that occasion, whether they were Members of the Senate or whether they were not. The reporter inquired of me about that, and I said to him that I wanted an opportunity to read the report to the members of the subcommittee and I asked others along with them.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. HASTINGS. Certainly.

Mr. BRATTON. The Senator will be good enough to say, will he not, that the three Republican members of the subcommittee were present and that neither of the Democratic members was present?

Mr. HASTINGS. That is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. HASTINGS. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Will the Senator be good enough to tell us whether the lady members of the conference participated in the decision against Mr. BANKHEAD?

Mr. HASTINGS. No; there were none there.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Oh, I think the Senator said a moment ago that there were.

Mr. HASTINGS. I do not propose to tell the Senator who were there.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is what I wished to find out. [Laughter.]

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed without amendment the bill (S. 3132) to extend the times for the commencement and completion of the bridge of the county of Norman and the town and village of Halstad, in said county, in the State of Minnesota, and the county of Traill and the town of Herberg, in said county, in the State of North Dakota, across the Red River of the North on the boundary line between said States.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2985) granting the consent of Congress to the Connecticut River State Bridge Commission, a statutory commission of the State of Connecticut created and existing under the provisions of special Act No. 496 of the General Assembly of the State of Connecticut, 1931 session, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Connecticut River, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7912) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, the bill pending before the Senate is H. R. 7912, which proposes to make appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes. The bill carries a total sum of $178,192,646.

Mr. President, that is a large sum of money. The question now arises, Whence are we to get the money with which to pay this enormous appropriation? The time that I shall occupy will be in support of a movement which was inaugurated last night, and more officially to-day, to try to bring money out of hoarding. I take it that this movement is for the particular purpose of providing the people with funds with which to pay taxes so that the people may have the money with which to pay this identical appropriation.

Mr. President, a few days ago I introduced a bill proposing to pay the veterans the full balance due them on their adjusted-service certificates. The amount due is approximately the same sum as this Congress has already made available through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the railroads, life insurance companies, banks, and other forms of corporate industry.

The plan of raising funds for adjustments with the veterans follows very closely the plan of financing industry. In order for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to secure funds, we made a direct appropriation of $500,000,000. We did not have this money in the Treasury, so we had or will have to issue bonds to raise the cash. Then we authorized the corporation to issue $1,500,000,000 in bonds with which to raise additional money to relieve the needy industries. Neither the Government nor the corporation could or can sell long-term bonds advantageously, so we had to pass a special act in effect amending the Reconstruction Finance Corporation law and authorizing the depositing of bonds for the basis of credit and currency.

Mr. President, this Congress has already set the precedent of authorizing the issuance of bonds and the depositing of such bonds with the Federal reserve system as the basis for the issuance of credit and currency. In the preparation of the bill for payment to the veterans, I followed the precedent already set by this Congress. I did not seek to disguise my plan. I stated it boldly and frankly. The plan for financing the payment to the veterans is in effect identical with the plan for financing loans to industry. Instead of concealing from the public, through a maze of laws and the intricacies of finance, I provide for the issuance of bonds, the depositing of such bonds with the 12 Federal reserve banks, and the issuance by such banks of Federal reserve bank notes with which to pay the veterans.

The Washington Post, a widely read newspaper, recently devoted some space editorially to the pending bill. I ask to have printed in the RECORD at this point the editorial to which I refer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Friday, March 4, 1932]

A PROSPERITY MAGICIAN

A few months ago Senator THOMAS (Democrat) of Oklahoma would have been satisfied with an ingenuous plan for securing payment in full of the soldiers' bonus. But destiny urged him on. If he could make veterans happy and prosperous out of the largess of Uncle Sam, why should he not extend his beneficence to all Americans? He probed deeper into the mysteries of finance and has emerged with a plan designed not only to pay off the complete obligation of the Government to veterans but to restore the smile of prosperity to all the land.

Like all strokes of genius, the Senator's plan is simple. It would create $2,400,000,000 of what might be termed "prosperity" currency. Of course, Uncle Sam does not have that amount of ready cash available for payment to veterans, because the obligation is not due until 1945. But that does not deter the Senator from the "Sooner" State. He asks the Treasury to issue bonds equal in amount to the bonus obligation. These would be distributed to Federal reserve banks, each bank receiving enough to pay off the bonus certificates of veterans living in its territory. But the bonds would not be turned over to the veterans. They would be used as a basis for Federal reserve notes of equal amount, and this currency would be turned over to beneficiaries of the bonus.

The effect of this ingenuous measure would be to increase the money in circulation by $2,400,000,000. Senator THOMAS envisions a sudden spurt in business and agriculture. Hoarding would be abandoned and the country would march forward to a new era of prosperity.

The Senator from Oklahoma is unduly modest. Having brought forth this novel device for rejuvenating a depression-ridden world, why does he wish to confine its operation to the bonus? Why not issue bonds, transfer them to the Federal reserve banks for conversion into money, and wipe out the national debt of about $18,000,000,000? Surely the magic power of creating money out of nothing should not be reserved for veterans alone! Let Congress turn over the Bureau of Printing and Engraving to the distinguished Senator-economist from Oklahoma, with full authority to restore America to prosperous and happy times within 30 days.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, the editor of the article just read has portrayed the benefits and blessings of the suggested legislation much better than I could possibly do; hence I welcome the support of this strong administration journal.

The bill for the payment of the balance due the soldiers proposes to increase the amount of money in circulation. We must have more cash to supply the demands now being made. Petitions for money are coming from every direction. Only a few days ago Will Rogers observed:

You can't get a room in Washington; every hotel is jammed to the doors with bankers from all over America to get their "handout" from the Dawes commission.

And I have asked the following prominent men in America this question: "What group has been more responsible for this financial mess—the farmers? Labor? Manufacturers? Tradesmen, or who?" and every man, Henry Ford, Garner, Newt Baker, Borah, Curtis, and a real financier, Barney Baruch, and every one of 'em without a moment's hesitation said: "Why, the big bankers." Yet they have the honor of being the first group to go on the "dole" in America.

Mr. President, in answer to the alleged Post editorial, let me call attention to another Post editorial of date January 2, 1932. The first column leader was headed: "Turn Bonds into Money."

In the article I note the following sentences:

There is a stringency of money in circulation. The dollar has an abnormal value because of the scarcity of dollars.

"The country needs more dollars," says the Post.

Again I quote:

Section 4 of the Federal reserve act authorizes the reserve banks to deposit United States Government bonds with the circulating privilege and receive from the Comptroller of the Currency Federal reserve bank notes of the same par value as the bonds.

Congress is about to authorize the issuance of bonds to help make up the Treasury deficit. Why should not these bonds carry the circulating privilege and be exchanged for Federal reserve bank notes? The release of $1,000,000,000 in Federal reserve bank notes, secured by the equivalent in bonds, would release $20,000,000,000 of credit on a solid gold basis.

On January 2—scarcely 60 days ago—the Post writer was perfectly clear and logical in his reasoning. At that time he understood the situation confronting the country. His solution of our economic ills, in part, has already been put into effect.

The money to meet the dole to big bankers is being secured through the plan suggested by the Washington Post. Can it be possible that the prominent spokesman for the administration is willing to raise money through bonds to feed hungry industry but is opposed to using the same plan to raise money to meet a just, deserved, needed, and committed obligation to the protectors and defenders of our country?

Again I quote:

The Federal reserve act contemplates the issuance of Federal reserve bank notes secured by United States bonds in times of emergency. The emergency now exists. * * *

Yes; the emergency now exists.

The Congress has already declared that such emergency exists for the holders of bonds against the Federal land bank system; and an emergency exists for railways, for life-insurance companies, and for banks.

The bill I am sponsoring declares a like emergency in favor of the millions of our youth; an emergency in favor of soldiers called to the colors, commanded to cross the seas and to fight on foreign soil. Youth, the flower of America in 1917—veterans, maimed, gassed, diseased, ill, and unemployed in 1932.

Senators, contrast the boys who were sent away in 1917 with the multiplied thousands of veterans who, on this cold, bleak, icy day, are cold and hungry and who are wondering, hoping, and praying that the Government they gave their all to defend and protect will not deny their petition now on file with the proper branch of their Government.

I ask permission to have printed at this point in my remarks the Washington Post editorial in full.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

[From the Washington Post of Saturday, January 2, 1932]

TURN BONDS INTO MONEY

The amount of cash withdrawn from banks and hoarded by the people is estimated at $1,000,000,000. If this cash were in banks, it would furnish a basis of credit amounting to twenty times as much, or $20,000,000,000.

The total amount of money nominally in circulation is over $4,800,000,000, amounting to $38 per capita. The amount actually in circulation is much less. The people have withdrawn and hoarded immense sums from circulating money, as well as from banks. The amount hoarded is unknown, but it is conservatively estimated that the total is equivalent to the shrinkage of $40,000,000,000 of credit.

The value of stocks diminished $60,000,000,000 after the market crash in 1929, affecting 17,000,000 stockholders. Real estate and other property diminished in value. Much of the apparent loss was unreal, because of fictitious values, but there were real losses running into billions. Property is now undervalued, because of pessimism and loss of confidence. Much property will recover normal value when confidence is restored.

There is a stringency of money in circulation. The dollar has an abnormal value because of the scarcity of dollars. A dollar will buy $1.45 worth of commodities. It will buy ten times as much stock on the New York Stock Exchange as it could buy in 1929. It can buy 40 per cent more factory labor. Millions of citizens are unable to obtain these dollars at any price in exchange for labor.

The country needs more dollars—not inflated dollars but 100-cent gold value dollars.

Section 4 of the Federal reserve act authorizes the reserve banks to deposit United States Government bonds with the circulating privilege and receive from the Comptroller of the Currency Federal reserve bank notes of the same par value as the bonds.

Congress is about to authorize the issuance of bonds to help make up the Treasury deficit. Why should not these bonds carry the circulating privilege and be exchanged for Federal reserve bank notes? The release of $1,000,000,000 in Federal reserve bank notes, secured by the equivalent in bonds, would release $20,000,000,000 of credit on a solid gold basis.

At present there are no bonds with the circulating privilege available for deposit with the Comptroller of the Currency. Unless the circulating privilege is stipulated in the forthcoming issue the Treasury will still further draw upon the public money resources, which are already too scanty to do the country's business. With the bonds exchangeable for Federal reserve bank notes the Treasury could pay out these notes for Government expenditures and thus put new money in circulation, thereby releasing an immense amount of credit.

With the passing of the emergency the bonds and notes should be retired, as the dollar and commodity prices will have returned to normal and there will be no need of extra circulation.

The Federal reserve act contemplates the issuance of Federal reserve bank notes secured by United States bonds in times of emergency. The emergency now exists, and yet the relief provided for by law has not been granted by Congress.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, on last night I listened to a series of radio addresses made by the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, the president of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and the distinguished leader of the minority in the Senate. The burden of the series of addresses, as I interpreted them, was that some one has kidnaped our dollars and the present whereabouts of both the kidnapers and our dollars is unknown.

Because of the importance of this nation-wide movement to get money into circulation in order to save our people from further loss, I wish to call attention to some of the high points in the several addresses made last night. Let me quote first from the President:

The time has now arrived for a new offensive rally in the spirit that has made America great. The battle front to-day is against the hoarding of currency.

Again I quote from the President's address:

One hoarded dollar deprives some wage earner of at least some part of his pay. Multiply this simple example by nearly $1,500,000,000 of idle money now hidden in the country, and you may get somewhere near a true picture of the enemy of our national security that we vaguely call "hoarding." It strangles our daily life, increases unemployment, and sorely afflicts our farmers. No one will deny that if the vast sums of money hoarded in the country to-day could be brought into active circulation there would be a great lift to the whole of our economic progress.

Let me next call attention to a few sentences from the address delivered by the former presiding officer of this body, now president of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, General Dawes. His address was a direct appeal to the people of the country. To them he said:

The money is yours. You had the right to draw it and you have the right and power to keep it in any form you please.

Again I quote:

With this $1,000,000,000 hoarded money back in the sound banks of our country as a basis of credit and increased purchasing power, the country should be assured of a return to prosperity in a reasonable time. As long as this currency is out of circulation we must remain as a people for an indefinite time under the terrible hardships of an unprecedented business, industrial, and commercial stagnation, with all its consequent human misery.

Quoting again from General Dawes:

If, therefore, you buy Government bonds to carry out the purposes of this national effort, pay for them in currency.

I next quote from the address delivered by the Secretary of the Treasury:

The measure of self-help which we are discussing this evening is simple and, if understood, obvious. It consists in restoring to active use the dollars that have been withdrawn from circulation.

The need for calling the existing situation to your attention has arisen because many of our citizens have taken the dollars which they command and placed them on the retired list. They have made of them idle dollars, which are of no service to the community and bring no return to their owners. As a result, we have suffered a vast credit contraction which, in turn, has adversely affected business and employment.

Again I quote from the address of the Secretary of the Treasury:

What I am referring to is the secreting of money in safe-deposit boxes or in socks or under mattresses or in a tin can, where it lies idle and ceases to work for its owner or anybody else.

Further the Secretary of the Treasury said:

Buried money, on the other hand, is so much paper or metal. It is inactive. It brings in no return. It does not grow. * * *

The Secretary made a plea for the return of the concealed and hidden dollars to active circulation. He even offered a ransom in the form of 2 per cent baby bonds due in one year. Then the Secretary made an appeal for the public to buy the bonds and to pay for them in cash, thus still further depleting the scant amount of actual money now permitted to be outside the Treasury.

I next desire to quote from the address delivered by the distinguished senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] as follows:

There is, however, one vital principle—

Says the Senator from Arkansas—

concerning which general, if not universal, concurrence may be had. It is that recovery can not be accomplished until the enormous volume of money that has been withdrawn from use and hoarded has been restored to circulation.

Again says the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]—

Just as money was necessary to victory in 1918, so it is essential in the present economic war.

Mr. President, we have now been in session for more than three months. Remedy after remedy to end the depression has been and is being tried. To-day a new panacea is proposed and a new appeal is being made to the American people. This appeal is for more money—actual money, currency—and the basis of the appeal is that if more money can be placed in circulation the end of the depression will soon be an accomplished fact.

At this point let me call attention to the amount of actual money—gold, silver, and paper—now in circulation. The total amount of money outside the Treasury on January 31, 1932, was $5,641,205,046. This amount is classified as being in circulation. Five hundred million dollars are scattered throughout the world. One hundred million dollars are in Cuba. One and one-half billion dollars are hoarded. The banks are required by law to keep approximately $1,000,000,000 subject to the demands of depositors. This leaves a balance of actual money outside the Treasury in the sum of approximately $2,651,000,000.

Let me also call attention to the fact that on January 31, 1932, we had on hand in circulation and in the Treasury the total sum of $9,378,002,702. This sum, when divided, shows that we had some five and a half billion dollars in circulation and some three and a half billion dollars retained in the Treasury.

Mr. President, the Comptroller of the Currency is under the jurisdiction of the Treasury Department. The Federal reserve system, managed by the Federal Reserve Board, is the direct agency of the Congress. The Treasury Department itself is only one branch of the Government. Hence, this record shows that the chief money hoarder is the Government of the United States.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I should like to ask the Senator if we could find some way of protecting depositors in the banks of the country, guaranteeing their deposits, if you like, or whatever one may choose to call the plan, if we could assure depositors that they are safe in putting their money in the banks, would not that do more to relieve the hoarding situation than almost anything else we could do?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, for many years efforts were made in the Congress to provide a national guaranty of bank deposits. For some reason the bill could not be passed. At the present time the bonding companies are unwilling to make bonds to guarantee deposits in the banks, and, for that reason, the banks are practically without power to guarantee to their customers the entire safety of their deposits. I agree with the Senator if that could be done, it would be influential at least in bringing from hoarding as much money as we have in circulation and placing that money in the banks for such use as the banks and the customers of the banks might care to make of it; but, Mr. President, I contend that if every dollar of money in America outside of the Treasury were to-day brought forth and placed on deposit even that sum would not nearly be sufficient to transact the business of the country under present conditions. The reason I make that statement is that in these times credit is frozen; credit is dead.

The banks are required by law to keep approximately $1,000,000,000 subject to the demands of depositors. This leaves a balance of actual money outside the Treasury in the sum of approximately $2,651,000,000. Let me call attention to the fact that on January 31, 1932, we had on hand, in circulation, and in the Treasury, the sum of nine billions. I gave those figures a moment ago. This sum, when divided, shows that we have some five and a half billions in circulation, and some three and a half billions still retained in the Treasury.

Mr. President, the Treasury Department itself is only one branch of the Government. Hence, this record shows that the chief money-hoarder is the Government of the United States.

At this point I ask to have read, for the information of the Senate, a resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 182) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Federal Reserve Board be directed to advise the Senate what steps it has taken, or proposes to take, to meet the existing depression and consequent unemployment and low prices.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I ask unanimous consent to have the resolution introduced, printed, and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, perhaps some may deny that the Government itself is the chief hoarder of money. Some may suggest that we do not have the gold to support additional circulation. What are the facts?

On January 31, 1932, we had gold coin and bullion held by the Treasury, Federal reserve banks, and Federal reserve agents in the total sum of $4,415,914,085. Under existing law, currency must be supported by at least 40 per cent of gold; hence, the gold on hand is sufficient legally to support over eleven billions of 100-cent gold-value dollars.

We have the gold; we have the currency ready for issue; an emergency exists among the veterans; they have our acknowledged obligations; and in their behalf I thank the Washington Post for its services in suggesting a plan for the raising of money through bonds, for its interpretation of the effects upon business through a generous increase of circulation, and for its services in calling this bill to the attention of the country.

Mr. President, a few days ago one of the papers in New York City carried a signed article by Clinton W. Gilbert. The article was published on March 4 in the New York Evening Post. This article is in explanation of the bill for a like purpose now pending in the House of Representatives, introduced by Congressman PATMAN, of Texas. It likewise gives its interpretation of the bill introduced in this body by myself and which is now pending. I ask unanimous consent that this signed article be printed at this point in connection with my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made.

The article is as follows:

THOMAS BILL PROVIDES FOR BOND ISSUES AND FEDERAL RESERVE NOTES

(By Clinton W. Gilbert, staff correspondent of Evening Post)

WASHINGTON, March 4.—Grave danger of a two and a half billion dollar inflation of the currency is involved in the bills pending in the House and Senate providing for the payment in full of the soldiers' bonus. It is estimated that if this legislation passes that it will cost the Government, according to the estimate of General Hines, head of the Veterans' Bureau, $2,600,000,000.

The Patman bill in the House does not tell where this money is coming from. It merely appropriates amounts necessary to carry out the plan of paying off the bonus in full. Presumably the bill contemplates the issue of greenbacks, irredeemable paper currency, to the amount of two and a half billion dollars.

RESERVE BANKS TO ABSORB IT

The Thomas bill in the Senate provides for two Government bond issues in an amount necessary to pay off the whole bonus. These bonds shall be distributed by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs among the Federal reserve banks in proportion to the amount of bonus money that has to be paid in the various Federal reserve districts, and the Federal reserve banks are authorized to issue Federal reserve notes equal to the face value of the bonds received by them.

Thus the Federal reserve currency, which now has a 40 per cent gold reserve supporting it, is to be diluted by an infusion of two and a half billions of notes with no gold reserve back of them. This two and a half billions is just as much printing-press money as would be the greenbacks that Mr. PATMAN seems to have in mind.

An enormous demand for the passing of this legislation has sprung up, not merely from the ex-soldiers but also from country bankers and merchants. The House and Senate are being bombarded with letters and telegrams supporting the bill, the idea being that the inflation will start business booming everywhere. The country is being circularized with estimates based on the number of ex-soldiers residing in each place, of the amount of money that would be put in circulation in the individual localities.

FLOOD OF PAPER MONEY

A table is introduced in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD showing the division of the $2,500,000,000 among the States. New York State would get $245,924,177 of this flood of paper money; Pennsylvania would receive $172,888,542. In a long table showing what each city would receive New York City is put down for $132,371,518 and Philadelphia for $35,900,796. The prospect of all these paper dollars makes the mouths of bankers and merchants water.

This plan is about twice as insidious as any bonus payment measure proposed before, and Congress has never been able to resist subsidies to the ex-soldiers.

The Patman bill will, no doubt, pass the House. If it is not reported out by the Ways and Means Committee it will be brought out by petition, as the prohibition amendment has just been. It may be held up for a few weeks, but it is sure to come up and be passed. And the Senate has never shown any greater powers of resistance to the soldiers' demand than the House has, so this latest plan to distribute money among the soldiers is likely to pass the Senate.

If it passes both Houses, it is, of course, to be expected that the President will veto it. But bonus measures in the past have been passed over the President's veto, and this one may be. Behind it is not only the strength of the veterans politically but the strong sentiment now existing and amply reflected in Congress for currency inflation.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, some may contend that these soldiers are not in need. When we first came to Washington in December, industry was in need—so much in need that we were held here during the first few days of this session until 10 o'clock one night to pass a bill in behalf of distressed and needy industry. Just a few nights before that we were held here until almost midnight to pass a bill in behalf of the people of foreign nations.

The information we have is that at this time there are 750,000 veterans unemployed. We have information that there are 800,000 veterans who are employed on part time. In the case of the money made available last winter the number of 2,454,741 of those veterans made application and were granted loans. That in itself is conclusive evidence that a very large number of the veterans of the country are in need of assistance.

At this point I wish to call the attention of the RECORD, and I hope a portion of the country, to an article that appeared in a paper in one of the far Western States. This article is entitled "Admirable Party Strategy." I regret that I am not speaking to more of the Members upon my own side of the aisle. I think they will be interested in this statement. If they are not to-day, they may be soon. I read:

To vigorously attack the effects of the depression and ignore the cause may restore confidence to a degree, but it can only mean disaster further on. For Democratic leadership to subscribe to a political truce in the face of conditions that demand immediate and remedial measures leaves the great mass of thinking people without a definite program. The situation would be ludicrous were it not so tragic to more than 20,000,000 Americans in actual need, and probably another 50,000,000 on the verge of bankruptcy.

Again I read:

For the first time since the war the Democrats have a majority in the lower House, and the Republican majority in the upper House is reduced to a minimum. The congressional elections of 1930, and more particularly the elections of 1931, were a mandate from the people. Congressional leadership knows that administration policies have been repudiated at the polls, and that those policies will not change with the transfer of Mellon. For Congress to ignore such a mandate in the interest of harmony—the swan song of favored interests—and declare a political truce as an "admirable party strategy" is to court the disfavor of an enlightened public conscience that expects definite action along definite and fundamental lines. The people want leadership that will address itself to the problem of ever-recurring panics of plenty. They will not be satisfied with an indorsement of policies already repudiated at the polls.

Mr. President, a few days ago the political party into which I was born, the party to which I hold and owe allegiance, the party which has honored me with membership in the Senate of the United States, held its convention in my State. The convention, by a unanimous vote, adopted a declaration of principles and policies.

Upon this platform the convention without a dissenting voice, indorsed our governor, William H. Murray, for the high office of President. Governor Murray approves of this platform. To-day he is facing the drifting snow and biting winds of the far Northwest in carrying his message to the people. Were he the Chief Executive of this Nation, the people would not be necessarily and unavoidably cold and hungry. Were he the President, the petitions of the millions of veterans would not be falling on deaf and unhearing ears.

Let me quote one plank from the Murray platform:

The Democratic Party, as a matter of common justice, favors paying speedily the remainder of the bonus due the veterans of the World War; and further, because these payments being paid in all parts of the country will prove an economic betterment to all classes of business and enterprises in all sections of the Republic.

Mr. President, in a few days hearings will start on Congressman PATMAN's bill in the House of Representatives. When those hearings start petitions signed by millions of ex-service men will be laid before that body. Demand is being made by these millions of ex-service men that they likewise be heard before the committees of the Senate. No doubt in a short time the bill to be passed by the House of Representatives will be presented in this body. If that should happen, I shall be one of those to insist upon a speedy consideration of that measure.

Mr. President, these soldier boys, three and a half million of them, seeing what is being done by this Congress, can not understand why it is that they themselves can not be heard. I prophesy that their petition will be heard before this Congress adjourns.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-five Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR].

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, just a word. I have already discussed the amendments I have offered. The first one, relating to barberry eradication, is proposed to be inserted on page 32 of the bill where there is a provision for an appropriation this year of $196,400.

As I stated the other day, the department has done all it can do, really, about these matters. However, I want to read from the very excellent bulletin the department has issued about the barberry eradication. There seems to be great doubt as to whether the barberry has anything in the world to do with spreading the rust. I, myself, after reading the bulletin, have doubt about the matter. The bulletin states:

Farmers often wonder why grain is not always rusted when it is growing near barberry bushes. There are two principal reasons: (1) The weather conditions are not always favorable for the development of rust, and (2) there are different varieties of the stem-rust fungus.

Then, again, on page 19, it says:

Some of the other species and varieties of barberry, however, are not subject to stem rust. The Japanese barberry is the most popular of the ornamental kinds which never rust.

And so on.

And then on page 21:

The first survey is completed in all of the 13 North Central States except 1. A second and more intensive survey is in progress. Necessary resurveys for destroying sprouts and seedlings also are in progress. These resurveys will be conducted as frequently as necessary to prevent sprouts and seedlings from developing.

This activity is a perfectly useless one, and I hope the Senate will strike out the appropriation on page 32. I ask for the yeas and nays, which I hope the Senate will grant.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, before the roll is called, I ask permission to have read at the desk a letter of March 5, 1932, received by me from the Chief of the Bureau of Plant Industry, of the United States Department of Agriculture, together with tables accompanying the letter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the letter was read, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
BUREAU OF PLANT INDUSTRY,
Washington, March 5, 1932.

Hon. EDWARD P. COSTIGAN,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR COSTIGAN: With reference to your inquiry regarding the barberry eradication activities of this bureau, the work is aimed to reduce the heavy losses from epidemics of black-stem rust of wheat, oats, barley, and rye. The losses due to black-stem rust of wheat are most severe in the spring-wheat growing territory, particularly of the Northern Great Plains, because the spring wheat matures later in the summer than the winter wheat and therefore is more susceptible to the ravages of the rust.

Cooperative activities in barberry eradication are under way with the following States: Colorado, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Michigan, Minnesota, Montana, Nebraska, North Dakota, Ohio, South Dakota, Wisconsin, and Wyoming. In this area the rust overwinters on the leaves of the common barberry bushes and therefore through the eradication of these plants throughout this area very material reduction in rust losses of small grains are being effected.

From 1916 to 1920, inclusive, the average annual losses of wheat from black-stem rust were approximately 57,700,000 bushels; from 1920 to 1925, inclusive, approximately 17,870,000 bushels; and from 1926 to 1930, approximately 9,600,000 bushels. Barberry eradication activities began in 1918 and the decided reduction in the losses from stem rust of wheat are believed to be largely, if not entirely, due to the destruction of nearly 20,000,000 common barberry bushes, which prior to 1918 were scattered widely throughout the spring-wheat area.

The common barberry has become naturalized in this general region and spreads readily from seed so that bushes still remaining in the eradication area are not only potential centers for development of stem-rust epidemics but serve also to reseed fence rows, wood lots, and other uncultivated lands if they are still present or allowed to remain. Accordingly, the present plans in the barberry-eradication work are directed to locating the remaining bushes, particularly in the more concentrated grain-growing areas, to bring about as rapidly as possible the complete elimination of bushes of the common barberry throughout the spring-wheat regions.

In view of the urgent importance of economy in Federal expenditures very material reduction in the proposed amount for the coming fiscal year was recommended by the department in preparation of the Budget estimates for 1933. The amount expended in this project in 1931 was $361,992. The amount appropriated for 1932 was $377,140, but of this sum curtailments have been made sufficient to provide a saving of $77,140, leaving $300,000 available for the work of the current fiscal year. The appropriation bill now before Congress carries an amount of $200,000, a decrease of $177,140 in appropriation, but an actual curtailment of $100,000 in the funds proposed for the barberry-eradication project in the fiscal year 1933.

Very truly yours,

WM. A. TAYLOR,
Chief of Bureau.

The tables are as follows:

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee is an attempt to destroy one of the major projects undertaken by the Department of Agriculture. The barberry is found prevalent in about 18 wheat-growing States, particularly those States from the Great Lakes to the Corn Belt States, and affects principally spring wheat. It not only causes a destruction of the crop, but renders unmarketable the wheat which is not wholly destroyed. The barberry is a host to a fungus which reaches the wheat and causes black stem rust. Whenever the barberry bush is destroyed there is a disappearance of black stem rust.

It is true the department has been working on this project since 1918. The diminution in the quantity and the extent of the loss since the work began is remarkable. From 1918 to 1926 the annual loss was about 60,000,000 bushels. During the last five years it has been less than 10,000,000 bushels annually. The department estimates that within a period of 10 years it will have completely under control this organism.

The reduction in this item is about 50 per cent over current law. Last year the department had $395,000. This year the amount carried in the bill, which is under the estimate of the Bureau of the Budget, is about $179,000, a decrease which is remarkable considering the importance and character of the work. If the farmers in the Corn Belt, the Great Lake States, and Southern States where wheat is raised, are to be denied this protection, it will add greatly to their cost of production and bring them more misery than they now have. It is surprising to me that one who has so long supported agriculture should be proposing an amendment to a major project which, if enacted into law, would destroy the effectiveness of the Department of Agriculture. I would suggest to the eminent Senator from Tennessee, in order to make short work of it and the remedy complete, that he simply propose an amendment to do away entirely with the Department of Agriculture. If we adopt his amendment, it critically and forcibly strikes at the foundation of this structure, the only one the agricultural people of the country have left, we might as well repeal the act and leave the farmer to his blighted state.

Of course, with that statement, I hope the amendment will not be accepted.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, there are probably some items in the bill that might well be stricken out without any particular harm to the farmers of the Nation, but this is one item I believe that should be left in the bill. North Dakota produces the largest amount of spring wheat of any of the States in the Union, and that is the type of wheat that is specially affected by this rust. The Agricultural Department has long advocated the eradication of the common barberry bush as a means of getting rid of the rust on spring wheat and some of the other spring grains.

We have in North Dakota, I believe, one of the best agricultural colleges in the United States in the way of doing real constructive work for the benefit of the farmer. We have some men who are well qualified for the work, who have experimented for years upon the barberry question, because it so largely affects the State of North Dakota. I remember in the year 1916 the weather turned to what seemed to be particularly favorable to rust for a few days in July, and our crop was practically destroyed by rust. Fields of wheat that were as good as one would want to see, merely because of the rust that came on and developed in a very few days were destroyed and much of the crop was not worth harvesting. We have done a great deal to eradicate the barberry bush in that State and adjoining States. The amount of rust has been lessened at least, and the men who have experimented through the agricultural college claim that it is the eradication of the barberry bush that has lessened the amount of rust throughout that section of the country.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. FRAZIER. Certainly.

Mr. TYDINGS. As a matter of information, I would like to ask the Senator from North Dakota to what extent the State of North Dakota appropriates money to eradicate the rust?

Mr. FRAZIER. I have not the figures at hand, but North Dakota has contributed to quite an extent during all these years, through the legislature and through the agricultural college, to the eradication of the barberry bush.

Mr. TYDINGS. Does the State put men in the field where the rust is prevalent and spend money to prevent its spread and growth?

Mr. FRAZIER. Yes. The State has spent a good deal of money and put men in the field to make a survey. Boys and young men from the agricultural college, under the direction of the agricultural college officials, make investigations and help in the removal and destruction of the barberry bushes wherever they are found.

Mr. TYDINGS. What proportion of the sum provided for the whole country would be allocated to North Dakota for this purpose, if the Senator can tell me?

Mr. FRAZIER. I can not answer the Senator's question. We produce more hard spring wheat than any other State in the Union, and while there is a surplus of wheat, yet we have never had a surplus of hard spring wheat.

Mr. TYDINGS. What is the total appropriation proposed to be made for this purpose?

Mr. McKELLAR. It is $196,400.

Mr. TYDINGS. The amount proposed to be appropriated is $196,400 and there are 18 States involved.

Mr. McKELLAR. But only $75,000 is for the joint purpose.

Mr. TYDINGS. Assuming that it is all to be used for that purpose——

Mr. McKELLAR. But it will not be.

Mr. TYDINGS. That would make about $10,000 per State. It has occurred to me that if the saving of grain runs into millions, as outlined here, the State itself would be wise in making the investment because the savings would be tenfold over the expenditures.

Mr. FRAZIER. The State has invested money in the eradication of the barberry bush for years and will continue to do so, but it is of such vital importance that it takes more than one State or more than the efforts of one State to bring about the necessary result.

Mr. TYDINGS. I realize, of course, that disease does not stop at the State boundary line. I can well see where the Federal Government might have to step in. But it occurred to me that the States directly reap the benefit of governmental aid and ought to pay a larger proportion of the cost of the work than they have been paying.

Mr. FRAZIER. All the other States reap a benefit also, because the hard spring wheat is needed in the production of good quality of flour. It is mixed with the so-called winter wheat to make a better quality of flour. Unless our hard spring wheat is protected in North Dakota and other States in that portion of the country, we will be compelled to import that kind of wheat from other countries.

Mr. TYDINGS. I believe that the action of the Federal Government should be concentrated along the boundary lines of the States where the disease takes on an interstate character, and that the States themselves for the most part ought to handle their internal war against this disease. It strikes me that the Federal Government is doing more than it can rightfully be called upon to do by taking over such a large amount of the cost of this campaign.

Over in my State of Maryland we have a lot of plant diseases, but we also appropriate a tremendous amount of money and have our own State officers go out and fight the disease. We have many peach orchards over there, and we have an entire force paid by the State which goes out wherever it may be needed to combat peach-orchard disease. We feel that having done that we should not be called upon to fight as well these diseases out in North Dakota, but that the Senator's State ought to pay its own way and the Federal Government should be concerned primarily only with the interstate character of the disease rather than the local character.

Mr. FRAZIER. With the price of wheat at from 40 to 60 cents a bushel, it is practically impossible for the State to finance these matters.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator also knows that we have an abundance of wheat which we can not sell. It strikes me, if this disease were unconfined and allowed to spread and destroy a lot of wheat, it would in the end help the price of wheat. We are really trying to grow more wheat than we can market, but by this campaign to prevent scales and diseases we are doing that which can only mean a decrease in the price that the farmer will get for his wheat.

Mr. FRAZIER. We have no surplus of the so-called hard spring wheat, and never have had.

Mr. TYDINGS. Leaving the spring wheat out of the question——

Mr. FRAZIER. If we did that, there would be no particular need for the eradication of the barberry bush.

Mr. TYDINGS. The more wheat we raise, the less it will bring. What we are trying to do is to raise more wheat in spite of the fact that we have already more wheat than we can possibly deal with. What is the sense in raising more wheat when we already have more wheat than we can use?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. FRAZIER. Certainly.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. May I say to the Senator from Maryland that this work was started in 1921, and it is estimated that it saved annually during the first five years about $20,000,000. It is to prevent rust, to kill the source of incubation of the spores that produce the rust. It is true that the rust spores would spread from one State to another, and if one State appropriates money to eliminate the incubation of the spores, they may come in from still another State.

Mr. TYDINGS. I realize that. May I ask the Senator from Oregon, if the Senator from North Dakota will permit, to what extent the States match this sum or help to bear the expense of this campaign?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I think the contribution in some 18 States where this disease more or less occurs is about 25 to 30 per cent on the part of the States.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, if whoever has the floor will yield to me further——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota has the floor. Does he yield further to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. FRAZIER. Certainly.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think the States should pay a heavier percentage than 30 per cent. I understand some of the States pay only 25 per cent of the campaign carried on which is primarily for the benefit of a particular State. I also realize that the disease can not be stopped at State lines and that the Federal Government is in its proper sphere in trying to handle the problem as a whole; but I respectfully suggest that where the war is intrastate the bulk of the funds ought to come from the State rather than from the National Treasury.

Mr. FRAZIER. I want to say to the able Senator from Maryland that under the present situation, with wheat bringing the prices it has been during the last fall and winter, there is really not much argument for the raising of wheat at all. In fact, we are raising it at a loss. The more the farmer raises the more he loses. But we do not expect these conditions to continue to exist permanently. We hope they will not, at least; and therefore provision should be made to eradicate the barberry bush in order that better conditions for wheat growing may exist for the future.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator is very fair in his comment to say that, and that was the thing I was attempting to point out. I do not want to stand in the light of the farmer. I want to help him make more money in his particular enterprise. But with wheat as it is now it seems to me it is foolish to spend money to enable the farmer to produce more wheat.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota may be more accurately familiar than I with this matter, but it is my understanding that the rust is not a disease peculiar to spring wheat but that it affects all varieties. The spring-wheat crop is the great crop of the Senator's State, and perhaps that is why his attention is more particularly directed to it.

I inquire of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] who has charge of the bill whether I am not correct in the contention that the black rust affects wheat of all varieties and is not confined alone to spring wheat?

Mr. McNARY. It attacks spring wheat, fall wheat, and winter wheat, but the spring wheat falls a more ready victim, because it matures later.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly.

Mr. McNARY. It also affects oats, rye, and barley, in fact, all cereal crops.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I find by reference to the record that wheat is grown to a greater or less extent in practically every State of the Union, and the answer to the inquiry addressed to the Senator from North Dakota by the Senator from Maryland is given in the bill itself, because it provides that "$75,000 of this amount shall be available for expenditure only when an equal amount shall have been appropriated, subscribed, or contributed by States, counties," and so forth. So that $75,000 of the appropriation must be matched by the States.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, as I understand, barberry rust is transmitted not only to cereal grains but—and in this respect I may be misinformed—it is regarded as a deadly menace to white pine. The United States Government has been spending considerable money in the past years on reforestation, and the States also have been expending considerable sums. Of course, if I am correct that the pollen or rust coming from the spores of the barberry is one of the enemies of white pine——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Is the Senator not in error there? The host of the white-pine blister rust is the wild currant.

Mr. BLAINE. It is the wild currant. I rather assumed from what I had observed that the white pine was also afflicted with the rust.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, one clause of the bill relates to the eradication of the barberry bush and a different one to the white-pine blister rust. Both operate along the same general lines, and the spores being carried by insects,, birds, and the wind, cover great distances. Both spores have host plants, in one case the barberry and in the other the wild currant and gooseberry, but they are two separate organisms.

Mr. BLAINE. They are separate but they are both covered by the provision we are now considering, are they not?

Mr. McNARY. No; this item simply has to do with the barberry. There is another provision of equal importance that affects white-pine blister. The pending item has to do simply with a parasite that affects the cereal crops—oats, barley, rye, and wheat—that is raised in the spring, as well as wheat which is planted in the winter and fall, though wheat planted in the spring is more susceptible by reason of its later maturity. The spores that cause the rust in wheat are developed on the barberry.

Mr. BLAINE. Is there a provision in this bill with reference to the control of the white-pine blister?

Mr. McNARY. Yes; there is in the bill, but it is not under this particular clause.

Mr. BLAINE. I am glad to have that information; but it seems to me that identically the same principle is involved in this measure as with respect to white-pine blister.

Mr. McNARY. Exactly.

Mr. BLAINE. The point I was endeavoring to make was that this is, after all, an interstate problem, and, as with respect to other matters of similar character, the Federal Government ought to cooperate.

My attention has been called to the fact that the next paragraph has to do with the control of the white-pine blister rust, and quite a large appropriation is made for that purpose.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield the floor.

Mr. McKELLAR. I merely wish to ask the Senator in my own times are there many barberry bushes in his State?

Mr. BLAINE. There were a good many barberry bushes of the species that carried this rust in my State before there was complete cooperation between the State and the Federal Government. I understand now that those barberry bushes have largely been eradicated; not wholly so, but to a large extent.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am glad to know that barberry bushes are not now growing in the Senator's State, because I find from this bulletin that the total number of spores of barberry rust on one bush are 64,000,000,000—thirty-eight times the population of the world—and that there are barberry bushes probably in every State in the Union. That being so, how can the Government by the expenditure of $75,000, divided among 20 States—less than $4,000 to a State—hope to eradicate a pest of this kind?

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee permit me to answer that question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. BLAINE. In answer to the question as to how the Federal Government can eradicate all the barberry bushes with the limited appropriation made, I wish to suggest to him that, so far as my own State is concerned, with the State cooperation there has been developed a community cooperation, so that practically the entire State is interested in the eradication of the barberry of the particular species that causes damage. That is to a large extent the value of Federal cooperation. It seems to be everybody's business when the people of the State once become interested in it, and therefore much of the work of eradication is voluntarily done by those who have on their premises the particularly objectionable species of barberry and who know what that species is. I doubt if there are very many individuals in the United States, if their attention were called to the particular menacing barberry, who would not themselves eradicate the barberry, and when a barberry bush is once eradicated, of course no more spores come from that bush.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is exactly what I have maintained all the time—that all the appropriation that is necessary is for the publication of these pamphlets, these bulletins, because they show as well as can be shown the steps which should be taken to eradicate the pest. Surely the United States Government ought not to be called upon to send its agents out to grub up every barberry bush in the country. If they undertook to do it, the result would be that we would have, notwithstanding the proviso in the bill, an infinite number of claims for having destroyed valuable barberry bushes throughout the country.

Now let me show the Senate just what this pamphlet says:

> Two things should be clearly understood: (1) The red spores which can affect the wheat or other grains directly rarely live through the winter north of Texas; (2) the black or winter spores, which do live through the winter in the North, can not infect grains or grasses directly.

In other words, infection can take place only under special conditions, and one of those conditions is that the spores may be blown from the South into the great plains area. The Government can not prevent that; the Government ought not to be called upon to try to do so.

Here is an appropriation, on page 32 of this bill, of $196,400, and then there is a proviso that $75,000 of that amount shall be available when the States put up like sums. All the rest of the appropriation goes to the bureau here in Washington. I want to say to the Senator from Wisconsin and to other Senators from the rust-infected States that $3,000 from the Government or $2,500 from the Government out of this $75,000 will enable very few barberry bushes to be pulled up. The appropriations for this bureau have been constantly going down in the last few years, three or four hundred thousand dollars having been appropriated last year and more than that the preceding year, and now the appropriation is cut down to $196,000; in other words, to barely enough to keep the bureau going. It is just one of those cases where the Government has done everything it can. When it has published the information in its bulletins it has done all that it can do to eradicate the barberry rust. It should not be expected to send its agents out all over the country to grub up these bushes, because just as we grub them up there are going to be Senators on the floor asking for reparation for having grubbed up barberry bushes.

So I hope this amendment will be adopted. I am not against anything that will help the farmers of the country; I am emphatically for anything that will help them; but this item is not designed to help the farmers, it is to help a bureaucracy here. See how that bureau comes into the fight? It gets the Secretary of Agriculture to write a letter here trying to uphold the interest of the bureaucrats who are running the bureau. Protest against the amendment does not come from the farmers, it comes from the bureaucrats here in Washington, who are framing the farmers.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. It seems to me that Congress will be placed in a very bad position if it spends several million dollars—at least $1,400,000—for the eradication of grasshoppers, when there are about eight and a half million people walking the streets unemployed who need food, clothing, and shelter. If money can be spared for things of this character it certainly is a strong argument why we ought to appropriate money for the necessities of human beings.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course the Senator from Maryland is right. With eight million unemployed and with many hundreds of thousands hungry in this country an appropriation of this kind, it seems to me, is utterly indefensible. What we are doing is simply to appropriate this money for the benefit of a bureau in Washington and not for the benefit of the farmer.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I simply rise to inquire of the Senator his construction of the language of the particular item of the bill to which he addresses himself. I have given to it an interpretation quite different from that I understood the Senator to give to it. If I understand the Senator aright, he said that $75,000 of this amount is to be used for the eradication of the barberry bush out in the field and the remainder is for the upkeep of the bureau here in Washington.

Mr. McKELLAR. I said, substantially, that. Seventy-five thousand from one hundred and ninety-six thousand will leave one hundred and twenty-one thousand. My recollection is from examining the Budget estimate, and I will have it before me in just a moment——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator is correct about that, I am with him. If seventy-five thousand of the amount is to be used for eradication of the barberry bush in the field, and one hundred and twenty-one thousand is to be used to maintain the bureau here in Washington, I would be disposed to vote with the Senator; but, that is not my construction of the provision.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will just wait a moment I will have the recommendation of the Bureau of the Budget as to the barberry item, which shows the salaries that are paid and the other expenses of the Washington office, which are not far from $121,000.

Mr. TYDINGS. While the Senator is looking up the item I think he will agree that because of the depression and the unemployment more human beings are suffering from disease to-day than ever before.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. If we have money to spend for the eradication of plant diseases, it certainly is more important to expend money on human beings.

Mr. McKELLAR. I agree with the Senator entirely.

Mr. TYDINGS. If we can not get money for both, we had better let the plants take care of themselves and devote that much money at least to taking care of the people.

Mr. McKELLAR. Temporarily, at any rate; but I want to say that out of the $121,000—I can not give the amount until I get the Budget estimate, and I have it not before me as yet——

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. McKELLAR. Indeed, I do.

Mr. DICKINSON. About $35,000 of this sum is used in the bureau here.

Mr. McKELLAR. What page is the Senator referring to?

Mr. DICKINSON. I got these figures from Mr. Jump, the Budget officer of the department.

Mr. McKELLAR. We have the exact figures here under the agricultural bill and I will get them in just a moment. I had the place marked.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I did not understand the statement made by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. DICKINSON. According to Mr. Jump, the Budget officer for the Department of Agriculture, $35,000 of this sum is used in the District of Columbia. The balance of it is used in the field.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I find it very difficult to conceive how $35,000 could possibly be used in the District of Columbia to administer an appropriation of $196,000.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, I want to suggest that there are two phases of work in connection with the barberry—one of them is the experimental phase, where they are trying to find resistant wheat that will not be affected by the rust, the other is the eradication in the field. The great majority of the amount used here in the District of Columbia is for the employment of the scientific personnel that has to do with searching out a rust-resistant type of wheat that is not affected by the barberry. The rest of the money is used simply for the organization in the various States of the personnel that go out and get in contact with the county agents and the State agricultural colleges that organize the forces to clear out and destroy the barberry bushes.

There is one other phase of this matter that I desire to suggest with reference to the suggestion of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], and that is that nearly all of our barberries grow along the rivers, and the rivers are the borders of the various States in the Mississippi Valley. The Mississippi River divides the State of Wisconsin and the State of Minnesota. That is likewise true between Illinois and Iowa. There are about 14 States out there that are affected by barberry eradication. The part of the Government, now that it has proven its case with reference to the eradication of the barberry bush, is to cooperate and coordinate these States, and keep them working on this program.

I do not believe there has been an appropriation made for the Agricultural Department that has been more effective or proven more valuable than the barberry-eradication program. It has shown a gradual decrease in the loss from rust every year. In view of the fact that there seems to be doubt in the mind of the Senator from Tennessee with reference to the amount of spores that are produced by one bush, I desire to suggest that out in a certain location in the State of North Dakota it was found that rust was gathering within 100 miles, and in the end it was all traced to an old barberry bush down in a woodlot along a creek. That was the cause of that loss, and its eradication remedied the thing the following year.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Is the Senator from Iowa able to make an estimate of how much wheat would be saved in dollars if all of this rust could be eradicated?

Mr. DICKINSON. I should not be able to do that, because it is an indeterminable amount. Last year the estimate was presumed to be 10,000,000 bushels of wheat. If it is worth 50 cents a bushel, the saving would be $5,000,000. If it is worth a dollar a bushel, the saving would be $10,000,000.

Mr. TYDINGS. It occurs to me that if 10,000,000 bushels more of wheat were thrown on the wheat market, it would depress the price still further.

Mr. DICKINSON. The Senator is not sincere in that. Let me show why.

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; I am very sincere.

Mr. DICKINSON. If the farmer is raising wheat, he is dependent upon his crop for his livelihood. Otherwise he would join this great army of unemployed that the Senator has.

Mr. TYDINGS. If we drive down the price of his wheat so that he produces it and gets less for it than it costs him to produce it, we will certainly drive him into the army of occupants of the poorhouse, because he can not keep on engaging in agriculture so long as the return he gets for his produce is less than the cost of producing it. What I am trying to point out to the Senator is that every 10,000,000 bushels of wheat we throw on the market means that wheat brings that much less per bushel, and in the end we really hurt the wheat farmer more than we help him by this kind of legislation.

Mr. DICKINSON. Let me suggest to the Senator from Maryland that efficiency in production is what we want. I do not know where the price is going to go, as to whether or not the farmer will be able under ordinary circumstances to continue to produce wheat. I do know, however, that we ought at least to give the farmer a chance to produce wheat, and not insist here that he shall have to fight the barberry bush together with all of the other elements that he has to fight in order to produce wheat at all. Otherwise sometime some of these people down in Maryland will be wanting some wheat, and the Senator from Maryland will be wondering where they are going to get it.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, the Senator will concede, of course, that to-day a farmer can not sell his wheat at the cost of production.

Mr. DICKINSON. Oh, yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is true, is it not?

Mr. DICKINSON. Yes. Neither can the labor of Maryland be sold for the cost of production.

Mr. TYDINGS. Let us stick to wheat for a moment.

Mr. DICKINSON. Oh, no; the Senator does not want to do that. He is trying to apply to wheat an economic principle that is absolutely applicable to every other element in the country.

Mr. TYDINGS. Why, of course it is.

Mr. DICKINSON. If we are going to try to have the wheat farmer afflicted with all the pests that can be gathered together, then in a little while we will not have any wheat. Perhaps that is the end that the Senator wants to reach.

Mr. TYDINGS. I did not get much of a chance to proceed, Mr. President, because the Senator broke in and destroyed what I was going to say without even waiting to hear it.

If the Senator will give me his attention now, he admitted that a farmer can not sell his wheat to-day for the cost of production. He also admitted that if we could completely eradicate the rust it would result in about 10,000,000 more bushels of wheat a year being thrown on the market. By every law of logic and economics, 10,000,000 additional bushels of wheat thrown on the market means that much less per bushel that the farmer is going to get for his wheat. Furthermore, Congress has taxed the Maryland farmer already——

Mr. DICKINSON. I wonder how long it has been——

Mr. TYDINGS. Just a moment, just a moment.

Mr. DICKINSON (continuing). Since the Senator from Maryland took a primary course in economics?

Mr. TYDINGS. Just a moment; I had not finished. I did not interrupt the Senator from Iowa. Furthermore, Congress has already taxed the Maryland farmer for his proportionate contribution to this fund. Then more wheat is produced, and he is denied the increased price which less wheat production would bring to him. So he is penalized twice.

Furthermore, if this thing is so important to the people of Iowa, why do they not pay for it? Why do they come here to the Federal Government and ask the Maryland farmers to pay for it? We do not ask you to pay for diseases affecting the wheat over in our State. We have rusts and diseases and different sorts of things that apply to agricultural products. We are able to take care of ourselves; but we pay into the Federal Treasury a great deal more money than we get back from the Federal Treasury.

We have been supporting these States out there over and over again, and we have more unemployed in Maryland than there are in all of Iowa. We have more people in Baltimore City being put out of their homes because they are unable to pay their rent. We have thousands of people over there with no income, living on charity; yet the Senator comes along and wants us to pay taxes to go out and further depress the price of a commodity which he himself admits is already bringing less than the cost of producing it.

So we are going around in a circle, and getting nowhere. If Iowa wants to stamp out this disease, let her raise her own money and stamp it out.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. I desire to cite a parallel comparison to my dear friend from Maryland.

For a number of years, ever since I have been on the Agricultural Committee, we have carried in the annual appropriation bill a very, very large amount to combat the chestnut bark blight, which was found originally in Maryland. Maryland and Virginia were particularly infected with it. The Government has spent in excess of $50,000,000 to endeavor to combat the chestnut-bark blight. Why tax the farmers of Oregon to pay for attempts to control the chestnut-bark blight in Maryland?

Mr. TYDINGS. I agree with the Senator; and if he will yield to me——

Mr. McNARY. I do not care a cent about it. I am very glad, in behalf of the good people of Oregon, to say that we were very happy indeed to be taxed to help out the good people of Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. First of all, the blight did not originate in Maryland. It originated in Pennsylvania. Secondly, if $50,000,000 has been spent on it, the Senator can not show me to-day a single, solitary chestnut tree that is standing in the State of Maryland; so that the $50,000,000 was absolutely wasted in so far as checking the blight was concerned. Every chestnut tree in Maryland died. They are standing there to-day in every woods you see; and if all the army of men who went out to stop the invasion of the chestnut blight could produce no better results than that, it is a very poor argument for appropriating this money to eradicate the barberry bush.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. FESS. The suggestion of the Senator from Maryland appeals to me and is along the line of the argument I have usually made; but I have had pointed out to me over and over that the reason why the destruction wrought by the chestnut blight became so complete was that we did not take it at the right time, when, if we had assaulted it, we might have controlled it.

Along that line I wish to say that I have voted to protect the peach trees against threatened rust, and the other fruit trees. We have voted to support embargoes against the importation of certain kinds of shrubs, the loss of which has been of great detriment to us; but we have done it as a penalty to ourselves to prevent further destruction. I agree with the Senator from Oregon. It strikes me that when it comes to protecting an article of food where there is a threatened blight, we are justified in taking the initial step quickly and not waiting until it gets beyond us.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, does the Senator know of any place in the United States where the attempt to check the spread of chestnut blight has been even in part successful?

Mr. FESS. I do not.

Mr. TYDINGS. As a matter of fact, even where the agents of the department have gone ahead of the blight, where they have anticipated its coming and spent millions of dollars to defeat it upon its arrival, the blight went right on through as if no action had been taken.

Mr. FESS. If the Senator please, I have gone through some of the mountains of Virginia and also West Virginia where I have seen what are called chestnut hills that are just like a woods of skeletons, standing as an object lesson of our impotency to prevent the very disastrous spread of the chestnut blight. I do not know how it could be prevented, but I think we ought not to refuse to do what seems to be possible.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should like to say to the Senator that I went through those chestnut woods last summer with a forester, and I am glad to report that notwithstanding the trees are dead, all around the base of each one of these trees new trees are growing up again. So that, although we will lose the benefit of having chestnut trees for some years, nature is doing much better for us than all the scientists of the Government have been able to do for us.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do; but can we not go on with this particular matter?

Mr. McNARY. I merely want to make one correction of the Senator from Maryland. There is not a sprout on an infected chestnut tree that will ever make another tree. Where they have appeared they have invariably disappeared up to the seventh year. So I am very unhappy to inform the Senator that his prediction is quite contrary to the scientific knowledge of the department.

Mr. TYDINGS. Contrary to what the Senator from Oregon has observed, may I say that many of these new trees are already bearing chestnuts. As a matter of fact, I picked several chestnut burrs and examined the chestnuts in them, and they were uniform, normal chestnuts. The real test of a tree's growth is its power to produce its seed.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]—and I should like to have his attention for just a moment—made a very proper inquiry a moment ago, namely, what is being done with this $176,000 or what will be done with the $196,400 that is appropriated here. I have the Budget before me now, and shall be glad to let the Senate know what happened to it.

First, I want to call the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill to the fact that in 1930 there was appropriated for this bureau, on which he says the whole Department of Agriculture rests, the sum of $379,920. Next year the amount was reduced to $377,140, and this year the President and the Director of the Budget reduced it from $377,140 to $200,000. In other words, the President and the Budget Director cut this appropriation nearly in two.

Now, I want to show what becomes of the balance of it. The head of this bureau gets $5,000 out of the $196,000. The next two get $4,000 each. The next one gets $1,680. The next one gets $3,000. The next one gets $2,000. The next two get $1,950 each. The next four get $1,680 each, the next one $1,440, the next one $1,620, the next one $1,110, the next one $1,140, and the next one $1,080, or a total of 14 persons drawing $31,530 of this appropriation, and they are here in Washington. When we get into the field these positions are arranged for: Four at $3,425 each, 1 at $1,920, 5 at $1,752, 4 at $1,470, 1 at $1,440, and 15—I suppose they are the ones who pull up the barberry bushes—get $2,005, or a total of $61,770.

The total personal services out of this $196,000 amount to $125,740, according to this record.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the Senator is now including everything. I suppose this is all paid to people who do the work, except what is to paid to the officers here in Washington.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I would not object to paying people actually in the field doing the work a fair and reasonable compensation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Nor would I, if they were doing work which was of any benefit, but I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that there are millions of barberry bushes in this country, that they have already grubbed up 18,000,000 and have not made a start on it, stating that they are just at the beginning. Yet the President cut the appropriation in two.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is quite apart from the question I presented to the Senator; that is, as to the amount paid to those who sit in swivel chairs here.

Mr. McKELLAR. The sum of $31,530 is paid to those who sit here. That much of the appropriation is paid to them. I was about to come to what is paid to those who go out into the field, those whose traveling expenses are paid, taking $45,000 of this appropriation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But let me remark that the way to reach that is not to strike out the appropriation. The way to reach that is by cutting out the unnecessary people holding sinecures.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is not the way it is done. The money is appropriated in a lump sum and they allocate it to suit themselves.

Printing and engraving, $1,800.

Rents, $1,800.

Repairs and alterations, $3,450.

Equipment, $3,700.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, that can be easily reached by providing just exactly how much shall be paid in the District of Columbia.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, it seems to me that there is but one way in the world to deal with these unnecessary bureaus, these bureaus which are doing no good. They can not possibly do any good. The amount allotted to each State is $2,500, and what good could be done with $2,500 allotted to the whole State of Wisconsin for the purpose of eradicating the barberry bushes in that State, when on one bush 64,000,000,000 of these insects can be generated, and they can be generated from two to five times a year.

Mr. President, I ask for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I do not care to make a speech, but I do want to make a few remarks about these amendments. I am going to vote for them, and I desire to state my reasons. My reasons go much deeper than the reasons expressed by those who are in favor of the amendment and those against them.

I think I have a right to assume that any appropriation which has been made by the Congress in the past, generally speaking, was for a useful purpose. The appropriation that was made to exterminate the barberry bush I am ready to admit was for a useful purpose. It probably has been wisely expended, and that is true of other appropriations which have been made.

Let Senators consider for a moment, however, that the expenses of government in the last few years have increased 500 per cent. A calamity came upon the people. The people will be able to adjust their own difficulties. In the course of time they will balance their budgets, and they will do it by cutting out some of the things they have enjoyed in the past. They will do without some of the things which are really useful to them. But I say in all sincerity that it is my humble belief that we will never bring prosperity again to this Nation, we will never bring happiness to this Nation, until we are able to reduce the expenses of government.

We have been talking a good deal about it in the newspapers, but we have not done anything about it. What little has been done has simply been nibbling around the edges. Such great reduction is needed, and so little will be made, that the little will afford no relief from the burdens which are imposed upon the people.

We must commence somewhere to reduce expenses. I know, because I have had some public service, covering probably 25 years, that the appropriations for any bureau can never be reduced without those reducing them being convinced that they are probably going to do harm. When a bureau is created, it immediately becomes a Frankenstein, and it is greater than its creator. That these bureaus can convince any Senator that it will do serious harm to reduce an appropriation I have no doubt, and I am not saying that it will not do harm. But when we take into consideration these questions we must balance one thing against the other, and find out whether more good will be accomplished by dispensing with an appropriation, or reducing it, than will be done by allowing it to be carried on.

Last night I heard speeches made over the radio by some of the leaders of the Nation on the question of hoarding which have been referred to to-day by Senators. I listened very attentively as the voices of those great men came over the air. But let me make this suggestion—that we will never be able to do anything about hoarding until we can restore the confidence of the people in their Government. They do not have confidence in their Government, either municipal, State, or National, at this time.

The result has been that they have taken their money and have hidden it away. The President has been crying for a long time, as the voice of one crying in the wilderness, for a reduction of expenditures in governmental affairs. The departments, the heads of which he appoints, pay no attention to him. The Senators belonging to his party, with the exception of a few of them, pay no attention to him.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield.

Mr. KING. May I say to my friend that I think if he will examine the budgets which have been prepared by the President of the United States, or under his direction, and which he has O. K'd and referred to the Senate for approval, he will find that they have called for larger appropriations than the Congress has been willing to make, five or six hundred million dollars more in the last few years.

His predecessor, Calvin Coolidge, obtained very wide approval upon the ground that he favored economy; but I may point out to my learned friend that during his term of service Congress refused to appropriate within several hundred million dollars of what he recommended. So that I am afraid that both Mr. Coolidge and Mr. Hoover are receiving eulogies—at least Mr. Hoover is—at the hands of the Senators, on the ground of economical recommendations, to which they are not entitled.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I am not eulogizing on the ground of recommendations but upon what has been stated time and again by the present President and by those of the past. I have no doubt that the President is sincere in his desire. But what can he do? He is surrounded by the heads of bureaus and the heads of departments, who, as I stated a while ago, control the Government and control the Congress as well. The trouble about it is that Congress authorizes the establishment of the bureaus, but instead of controlling their activities and making the appropriations, the heads of the bureaus come and control Congress, as well as the executive departments of the Government.

What I started to say was this: I do not know how much we may be able to reduce appropriations. I only know that sometime a Congress must have the courage to rise up and say, "We are going to reduce the expenses of government at least a billion dollars." That is what we ought to do. That is what we could do if we had the courage to do it. Of course, the bureaus will complain; but they never go out of existence; they never quit because their appropriations are cut down, and even if they did we would limp along some way without them until we could reinstate them under more favorable circumstances.

If Congress should say to the people of the United States that we really meant what we said when we suggested that appropriations should be reduced and that the expenses of government should be reduced we would have no difficulty about hoarding. The people would go into business, they would put their money back into the trades again. But, knowing what is going on, I do not blame them for seeking some nook where they can find shelter, because they are in danger unless sooner or later we do the things which are obviously necessary.

It is for these reasons, if I may be pardoned, that I shall vote for the amendments of the Senator from Tennessee—not that I think the work for which these appropriations are provided has not been well done, not that I think the work is unnecessary, but because I believe that we must call upon some one to make a sacrifice to save the Nation. I shall vote for those amendments and all others having substantially the same purposes in view.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I think any proposal to lessen the expenses of the Government must meet with favorable response in every heart, but it seems to me that the Senator from Tennessee is making a mistake when he asks for a test vote on an item which has to do with an essential food product of our people.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am not asking a test vote on this amendment particularly; I am simply bringing this up now because it is the first in order. As a matter of fact, and so that the Senate may understand that I have no desire except to be perfectly fair to all sections of our country, the next amendment I propose to offer is one to eradicate the appropriation for the control of the southern cattle tick, which applies peculiarly to the section of the country from which I come.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator is unfortunate in his particular places of attack.

Mr. McKELLAR. That may be so.

Mr. COPELAND. We can not afford to take chances with those articles of food. The barberry bush, as I understand it, is capable of carrying a pest which infects the wheat supply. It would be an absurd thing, as I see it, to interfere with the activity of the scientific department in undertaking to stop a scourge which has in it the possibility of the destruction of a cereal which is the very fundamental food of the American people.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. COPELAND. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator that the record shows that these appropriations were begun in the year 1917 and have been continued year by year ever since, and that wheat production has increased virtually every year since.

Mr. COPELAND. That may be true; but attacking the pests which have to do with the destruction of our food supply is like attacking those pests or germs of epidemic which have to do with the health of the human family. I heard a little while ago discussion about the chestnut blight. My friend from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] spoke about the bushes that are growing up from the roots of the trees. On my farm during that blight we lost 130 magnificent chestnut trees, some of them 3 to 3½ feet in diameter. It is true that from the roots of them have sprung up some shrubs, but they die out in three or four years because the pest is still there. But the failure of the Government to deal with the chestnut blight is no reflection at all upon the Government in dealing with some other blight. It is a well-recognized fact that this particular blight is a serious and damaging thing to the wheat of our country.

I will gladly join the Senator from Tennessee in an attack upon those activities of government which are nonessential, but I think it would be a great mistake to put still greater burdens upon farmers of the country, who are already weighted down with burdens. If by making this appropriation we are doing something to preserve that important cereal crop, I judge it to be the duty of government to do what it can to go forward with the activity. So I hope the Senator will choose other particular activities of government upon which to make his fight instead of upon one which is so fundamentally important.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, from past experience I have learned that it is a thankless task to attempt to stem the tide of federalism or to keep the activities of the Federal Government within legitimate and constitutional bounds; indeed, efforts in that direction, no matter by whom made, are abortive; the tide of federalism sweeps on with increased momentum and power. It carries before it the citadels of individual rights, of local self-government and of powers and prerogatives belonging to the sovereign States. Federal departments, agencies, and bureaus are so powerfully intrenched that every effort to limit appropriations or to enforce economy meets with but little success. I might add that all executive departments and Federal agencies are fortified camps from which sally forth valiant warriors to defend intrenched bureaucracy and to oppose all who have the temerity to attack them.

Civil service may have advantages, but it has manifold defects. A compact organization of nearly a million civil-service employees holding office for life constitutes a formidable force to maintain the status quo against needed reforms and to contend for increased privileges and powers. It has been said by many critics of the civil-service system that it enchains the able, vigorous, and progressive and prevents them from accomplishing what their laudable ambitions and desire for public service inspires. Not infrequently civil-service employees have told me that they have been admonished by associates to not exert themselves as they had been doing but to moderate their activities. Within the civil service are tens of thousands of splendid, patriotic men and women who desire that their work shall be well done and that efficiency and economy shall characterize the public service. It must be admitted, however, that the increase in the number of Federal employees is too great and that the increase in Federal agencies and bureaucratic organizations has grown to an alarming degree.

President Coolidge when in office felt the resistless power of bureaucratic forces and, notwithstanding his efforts, was unable to effectuate needed administrative reforms. That he recognized the evils of bureaucracy is evidenced in his Williamsburg speech on May 15, 1926, where he said:

> * * * The Federal Government ought to resist the tendency to be loaded up with duties that the States should perform. It does not follow that, because something ought to be done, the National Government ought to do it. * * * Artificial propaganda, paid agitators, selfish interests, all impinge upon members of legislative bodies to force them to represent special elements rather than the great body of their constituency. * * * No method of procedure has ever been devised by which liberty could be divorced from local self-government. No plan of centralization has ever been adopted which did not result in bureaucracy, tyranny, inflexibility, reaction, and decline. Of all forms of government, those administered by bureaus are about the least satisfactory to an enlightened and progressive people. Being irresponsible they become autocratic, and being autocratic they resist all development. Unless bureaucracy is constantly resisted it breaks down representative government and overwhelms democracy. It is the one element in our institutions that sets up the pretense of having authority over everybody and being responsible to nobody. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, May 17, 1926, p. 9490.)

President Coolidge recognized that the Federal Government was improperly if not illegally extending its jurisdiction, and that responsibilities and duties resting upon the States were being transferred from them to the National Government. Everyone familiar with the history of this Republic recognizes the increasing power of the National Government and the weakening of the authority of the sovereign States. We hear but little these days about sovereign States; they seem to be vanishing shadows. Students of the Constitution and of contemporaneous history are forced to the melancholy conclusion that the unitary form of government is in the ascendency and that the foundations of our dual form of government are being undermined. Amendments to the Constitution have been advocated which strip the States of sovereign authority, encroach upon their police powers, and interfere with their undoubted, inherent, and reserved rights.

It has been said by some that our conceptions of constitutional morality have been destroyed and that amendments to the Constitution are no longer needed to enable the Federal Government to engage in activities and embark upon policies which heretofore have been regarded as beyond its province and solely within the cognizance of the States. The contention is that the will of the people is controlling, and is not limited by the Constitution. The abdication by the States of any authority results in still further renunciations, and each act of betrayal of the rights of the States becomes a precedent for further disloyalty and dulls the conscience of the people in the consideration of political questions, particularly where the rights of individuals and the powers of the sovereign States are involved.

It is a trite remark that the lessons of history are soon forgotten. This is particularly true so far as they deal with nations, political institutions, and governmental questions. We read of the rise and fall of nations, and the opinions and judgments of competent historians and philosophers as to the causes of changes in governments and human institutions, but they are forgotten, and we follow the paths over which struggling humanity, with bruised feet has reached great heights and descended to tragic depths. We denounce despotism, bureaucracy, and concentrated power, but, forgetful of our denunciations, adopt policies and follow paths that lead to confusion and defeat.

May I again quote from Mr. Coolidge, who, in a Memorial Day speech in 1926, said:

> Demand has grown up for a greater concentration of powers in the Federal Government. If we will fairly consider it, we must conclude that the remedy would be worse than the disease. What we need is not more Federal Government but better local government. From every position of consistency with our system, more centralization ought to be avoided. The States would protest promptly enough anything savoring of Federal usurpation * * * Once the evasion of local responsibilities becomes a habit, there is no knowing how far the consequences may reach. Every step in such a progression will be unfortunate alike for States and Nation.

The increase in Federal activities, the multiplication of bureaus and Federal agencies have suffered no interruption as the years have gone by, but on the contrary have attained increased momentum. There are 10 departments of Government, with scores of bureaus and executive agencies, There are at least 150 bureaus and divisions, approximately 40 independent establishments, and a multitude of other executive agencies too numerous to mention and difficult to ascertain.

Bureaucracy is active in propagandizing the people for increased power and for the extension of Federal authority.

There is scarcely a gathering of any importance in the United States of a social, political, or business character, including chambers of commerce, civic organizations, Rotary, Kiwanis, and similar organizations, where there are not one or more, usually more, representatives of Federal departments and agencies ready to submit addresses and to show the necessity of Federal activities in connection with State concerns and the business of the country. They carry on a persistent propaganda and are largely responsible for developing sentiment resulting in demands for Federal appropriations far beyond what would be proper and fair and with respect to functions not within the legitimate province of the National Government. I know many instances where demands for appropriations have been stimulated by propaganda of these paid employees of the Government. They are sent to these various gatherings to which I have referred, and their expenses are paid by the taxpayers of the United States. It would be interesting to know the aggregate amount expended by the Government in meeting the expenses of the army of propagandists, representatives, and agents and employees of the Federal Government in the United States as well as of those who do not confine their activities to the United States but traverse seas and carry on their work in far-distant lands.

Mr. Lawrence Sullivan, in a series of illuminating articles appearing in the February, March, and April (1931) numbers of the Atlantic Monthly, presents facts which should challenge the attention of the American people, and compel the reactionary and hard-shelled bureaucratic institutions to modify their course and introduce reforms and economies so imperatively needed. It is a matter of general knowledge that there are many unnecessary bureaus and Federal agencies, that their activities overlap, and that there is an enormous amount of duplication. Mr. Sullivan in his article in the February number states that there are more than 1,000,000 names on the Federal Government's pay roll. The Bureau of the Budget on the 30th of January of this year released a statement showing the number and total salaries of the civilian employees of the executive branches of the Government, and also the number in the military service. I might add that since the data from which the statement was compiled became available there have been a large number of additions to the Government pay roll, and several additional executive organizations have been created. This statement shows that the total number of civilian and military employees of the Government is 1,037,373, and their salaries for the current year amounted to $1,315,690,467.12.

The country was startled a few years ago when it was informed that the cost of the Government for two years was a billion dollars. The taxpayers are now compelled to pay more than $1,300,000,000 annually for the salaries of Federal employees. In addition to this stupendous sum an enormous budget of considerably more than $1,000,000,000 for pensions and the compensation of ex-service men has to be met. This does not include, of course, the payments made for adjusted compensation. I might add in passing that the amount paid to ex-service men since the war for compensation, insurance, hospitalization, and the expenses of the Veterans' Bureau has been more than $6,000,000,000.

In commenting upon the duplication of Federal bureaus, Mr. Sullivan states that in the early days of the Republic, only the customs agents of the Treasury were empowered to make arrests, whereas now there are more than 25 different grades of Federal police officers scattered through seven different departments. He adds that if the Federal organization had expanded since 1800, to keep in step with the increase of population, there would be on the civil-service rolls less than 2,000 names, instead of more than one-half a million, or if the Government Establishment had expanded 100 times as rapidly as the increase in population, there would be but 120,000 names on the civil-service list. Unfortunately, it has expanded more than 400 times in relation to population. The further interesting fact is disclosed that in 1820 there was 1 Federal employee for every 1,173 inhabitants, but in 1920 the ratio stood at 1 employee for every 118 inhabitants. In the decade between 1890 and 1900 the population increased 20.7 per cent, but the civil-service rolls increased by 54 per cent. It should be added, however, that there are tens of thousands of Federal employees whose names are not on the civil-service register. The same writer states that since 1920 the number of Federal employees classified and nonclassified has grown from 297,000 to 800,000, or at the rate of 1 Federal worker for every 85 in additional population.

Further interesting figures presented by Mr. Sullivan show that in 1850 the total expenditures of the Government were but $44,757,000, or $1.93 per capita, but for the fiscal year 1930 the expenditures were $4,710,377,376, equivalent to $38.42 for every man, woman, and child enumerated in the census for that year. In addition to the appropriations made, there were authorized appropriations totaling hundreds of millions of dollars. He refers to the extravagant appropriations for Federal buildings, and Senators have heard valid criticism of the unjustifiable cost of the new Commerce Department Building. I have been told that each room of this structure cost more than $5,000, making the cost per room unprecedentedly large. The Department of Agriculture, to which I shall refer later, has grown to such enormous and disfiguring proportions that the bill before us calls for nearly $200,000,000, and it is demanding a building to house its army of employees which will be larger, and doubtless more costly, than the Department of Commerce Building.

Mr. Sullivan strikes at bureaucracy in the following words:

> Wherever encountered, bureaucracy is always the same—governmental functions administered without human imagination, without flexibility, shamefully deficient in those qualities of ingenuity, accommodation, and energy so necessary to accomplishment of the work of the world. It is, however multitudinous or widely scattered its manifestations, that form of government which moves by the letter of hundreds, even thousands, of laws until administrative functions become ridiculously and inextricably involved—and then collapses. It is a form of institutional creeping paralysis, all the more insidious because it does not strike a staggering blow, like a heart attack, and thus summon the physician; but, instead, slowly devitalizes the body cells of the administrative organism in myriad divisions, bureaus, sections, and offices, until there remains only the emaciated hulk of the civil-service rolls, stimulated to a new lease on life every winter by the activities of the House and Senate Committees on Appropriations.

In the April number of the Atlantic Monthly Mr. Sullivan states that there was before Congress in 1924 a report of a committee which revealed that Government construction projects are initiated and supervised by no less than 25 separate agencies of the Government, 7 of which are in the Interior Department; 5 others are in the Department of Agriculture, 3 in the Department of Commerce, 3 in the Treasury Department, and the remainder scattered from the Panama Canal Office to the Bureau of Immigration. The same committee reported that marine charts are—

> Prepared daily by the Bureau of Navigation, Navy Department; Geodetic Survey, Commerce Department; and the Lake Survey, War Department. Twenty-four agencies are engaged in topographical surveys and mapping. Engineering research is carried on by 24 bureaus and offices. Fifteen divisions administer rivers and harbors projects.

These statements, impressive as they are, fail to reveal the numberless organizations of the Federal Government, the duplications, overlapping, and inefficient and archaic methods. No business organization could survive for any considerable length of time if it were to adopt the methods that are followed by the Federal Government in handling its affairs. No matter how often attention is challenged to the inefficiency of bureaucracy, the waste and extravagance of the Federal Government, the duplication of activities, changes are not made. Once a bureau or agency is established it becomes immortal.

Many organizations effected during the war still exist. The period of depression from which the people are suffering revives obsolete and unnecessary organizations and results in the creation of additional ones. More than 10,000 names have been added to the civil-service register during the past year, and perhaps a larger number not within the classified service. If this Congress responds to the clamor and demands of Federal organizations, the appropriations for the payment of Federal employees for the next fiscal year will exceed the stupendous sum to which I have called attention, which was appropriated for like purposes for the present fiscal year. Already there is a nation-wide propaganda, doubtless inspired by executive agencies, organized to prevent any reduction of salaries of Federal employees, as well as to prevent the abolition of useless bureaus and executive organizations. If Congress did its duty to the country, it would abolish scores of bureaus and executive agencies and separate from Government service several hundred thousand employees.

There is no business man of experience who is familiar with the administrative activities of the Government and its bureaus and organizations who will not admit that many bureaus and agencies could be abolished and hundreds of thousands of employees separated from the service, with resulting increased efficiency, to say nothing of the tens of millions of dollars that would be annually saved to the taxpayers of the United States.

Mr. Sullivan states that following the year 1890:

The mania for boards, commissions, and joint committees developed rapidly. Theodore Roosevelt's administration brought 19 new boards and 57 new commissions into being between 1901 and 1909. President Taft's four years recorded the launching of 13 additional commissions and 32 new boards.

Counting every sort of board, commission, committee, joint committee, and special delegation, 492 independent administrative and legislative agencies were created between March 4, 1901, the beginning of the Roosevelt era, and March 4, 1929, the end of Mr. Coolidge's administration.

Mr. Sullivan states that between the end of the Wilson administration and inauguration of President Hoover on March 4, 1929:

There were no less than 32 new boards and 62 new commissions created either by congressional resolution or by Presidential proclamation.

And that during the first two years of Mr. Hoover's term—

Seventeen commissions, committees, or boards were established—which compares with 46 new agencies set up during the last two years of Mr. Coolidge's administration.

It is unfortunate that the party in power did not remember the statement made by Mr. Hoover before the joint committee on reorganization on January 22, 1924, to the effect that—

Our industries and business are badgered to death for duplicate information by a host of noncoordinating agencies.

Mr. Hoover has upon various occasions expressed the view that there should be reorganization of Federal agencies, and it is to be hoped that before Congress adjourns the necessary measures will be adopted that will compel a reorganization of Federal agencies, bureaus, and departments, and to abolish scores of useless bureaus, commissions, and boards, with a resultant separation from the service of tens of thousands of unnecessary employees. And it is to be hoped that in enacting the necessary measures to accomplish these results, limitations will be put upon the Federal Government and Federal agencies so that they will not transcend constitutional limitations.

We must remember that the history of liberty is the history of limitation of governmental power—not the increase of it. When we resist, therefore, the concentration of power, we are resisting the process of death, because concentration of power is what always precedes the destruction of human liberties.

During the World War there was necessarily an increase in Federal activities and in the number of Federal employees, but with the return to peace-time conditions war organizations should have been abolished and their personnel discharged. Unfortunately, demobilization was opposed, and many thousands of persons are still Government employees.

The platform of the Republican Party in 1920 criticized the Democratic administration because it had "not demobilized the army of place holders," and because it "continued an arbitrary and inquisitorial control over the life of the people in time of peace and to carry confusion into industrial life." This was a criticism of the alleged failure of the Democratic Party, that had been in control of the Government during the World War, to abolish executive organizations created during the war, some of which were employed in the production of munitions and commodities essential to the prosecution of the war. The platform further condemned the Democratic Party because it had not "abolished departments and the army of place holders still mobilized."

It would be ludicrous if it were not do disappointing to compare the platform declarations of the Republican Party of 1920 with its policies after Mr. Harding became President. Its platform declared that the party would "end executive autocracy and restore to the people their constitutional government." The same platform condemned the Democratic Party because there had been "an increase subsequent to the armistice of 2,184 employees," but since the Republican Party has come into power there have been added to the pay roll tens of thousands of Federal employees."

Notwithstanding the Republicans in the same platform declared—

* * * The annual expenses of the Federal Government can be reduced hundreds of millions of dollars without impairing the efficiency of the public service—

there has been a constant increase in Federal appropriations and in the number of Federal employees; military costs of the Government during these years of peace have been greater than ever before except during the war, and all departments have expanded their authority and projected themselves into fields of individual endeavor and disturbed legitimate private enterprise. The expenses of the Government have risen to huge proportions and Federal employees have multiplied until they constitute a powerful army. Deficits have been created notwithstanding the heavy taxes imposed upon the people and searching inquiries are being made to find sources of taxation to prevent further deficits. The Republican platform pledged the party to a policy of rigid economy, to the better coordination of departmental activities, to the elimination of unnecessary officials and employees, and to the raising of the standard of individual efficiency. It also pledged the party to a—

Thorough investigation of the Federal departments and bureaus, with a view to securing consolidation, a more businesslike distribution of functions, the elimination of duplication, delays, and overlapping of work, and the establishment of an up-to-date and efficient administrative organization.

These are declarations made in 1920 by the Republican Party. It has controlled the executive and legislative branches of the Government ever since 1921, except that since December last the House of Representatives has had a narrow Democratic majority. In the face of these high-sounding platform declarations it must be a source of regret, if not humiliation, to sincere members of that great party when confronted with the record of unfulfilled pledges. There has been no organization or consolidation of departments and bureaus; no businesslike distribution of the functions of executive agencies. There are more duplications and overlapping in Federal agencies than ever before, and notwithstanding the enormous increase in the number of employees there is more waste and extravagance and less efficiency in administration than at any previous period.

It is not my purpose in calling attention to the platform of the Republican Party to criticize my Republican friends. They were in the grasp of a powerful Federal bureaucracy from which they seemed unable to extricate themselves. Moreover, the people—Republicans and Democrats alike—have demanded legislation not in harmony with the platform pledges referred to; they have opposed the abolition of Federal agencies and the separation of needless employees from Government pay rolls; they have appealed to Congress to enact measures which encroached upon the rights of the States, interfered with individual liberty, and augmented the authority of the Federal Government. The Democrats in and out of Congress have too often given support to these demands and failed to oppose measures which have resulted in strengthening the forces of bureaucracy and to devitalize the States. Both political parties, in my opinion, have failed to defend the States, protect individual rights, and maintain democratic institutions.

Mr. President, addressing myself to the bill before us, it is to be observed that when opposition is made to any particular item there are those who will defend the appropriation and urge that if reductions are to be made, other provisions in the bill must bear the reduction. The Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] in opposing the motion now before us, to strike out the item appropriating nearly $200,000 for "barberry eradication," suggested that the attack should be made upon other provisions of the bill. He referred, as I recall, to the President, and his recommendations for authority to consolidate Federal organizations in the interest of economy. Undoubtedly there should be, as I have tried to say, consolidations and the abolition of many bureaus and Federal agencies.

I do not forget, however, that the Department of Commerce under the President increased its jurisdiction and authority to an amazing extent and obtained appropriations vastly in excess of what had formerly been made to meet the annual expenses of the same. In my opinion, no department in the Government has been more extravagant, if not wasteful, than the Department of Commerce. Perhaps I should except the Department of Agriculture and the War and Navy Departments. They have received appropriations largely in excess of all legitimate requirements. In my opinion, an appropriation of $750,000,000 to meet the ordinary expenses of the War and Navy Departments in times of peace can not be justified. We will soon have before us a bill calling for new naval construction, the ultimate cost of which will be substantially $1,000,000,000 and appropriation bills carrying more than $700,000,000 for the ordinary expenses of these two departments for the next fiscal year will soon be reported.

In my opinion, the agricultural bill before us should be reduced at least twenty or twenty-five million dollars, and the appropriations for the War and Navy Departments to meet the general expenses for the next fiscal year should not exceed $550,000,000. When we are confronted with a deficit for the present fiscal year amounting to approximately two and one-half billion dollars, it seems to me there should be a determined stand by Senators in opposition to the enormous appropriations recommended by the President of the United States in the Budget recently transmitted by him to the Congress. His Budget recommendations amount to $4,667,845,468 to meet the expenses for the next fiscal year.

It is obvious that without imposing additional heavy burdens of taxation upon the people the deficit for the next fiscal year, if the recommendations contained in the Budget are met, will exceed the deficit of two and one-half billion dollars for the current year. The Budget, of course, must be balanced. It can only be done by increasing taxes and reducing appropriations asked for by every department of the Government.

In my opinion, the appropriations for the next fiscal year should be $500,000,000 less than those for the present fiscal year. It is certain that the ordinary revenues for the coming fiscal year will be less by hundreds of millions of dollars than those for the fiscal year of 1931 and perhaps not greatly different from the revenues for the fiscal year ending June 30 of this year. No Senator can look with any degree of satisfaction upon a situation which requires increasing tax burdens. Only a most difficult situation justifies in a period of depression a policy calling for increased taxes. But it would be poor statesmanship not to provide revenue to meet the expenses of the Government. If that shall not be done, the national credit will be impaired, and that will react unfavorably upon the industries and business of the country. If Government bonds should fall below par, obviously other securities—State, municipal, corporation, or individual—would materially decline.

The smaller the appropriations made by Congress the lighter will be the burden, which, nevertheless, will be heavy, resting upon the taxpayers of the United States. I may add, however, that it will require not only wisdom but great ingenuity to frame a tax bill that will meet the situation and, which, though oppressive, can be borne by the people.

Mr. President, I have referred to the Agriculture Department as one which has been wasteful and extravagant. In my opinion its exactions and expenditures for a number of years last past call for condemnation. It has grown and expanded far beyond legitimate requirements. I recall that when I was in the House a few years ago its annual appropriations were approximately $5,000,000. In 1865 or 1866, when this department was organized, the appropriation was less than $300,000. By 1910 its expenditures were $17,136,736 and its employees numbered 12,480. In 1911, $20,000,000 were appropriated, not including appropriations for highways. There was an increase in the number of employees, and in 1912 the appropriations reached $22,403,000. In 1914, $24,000,000 were appropriated for the department. In 1915, $25,000,000, and in 1917, $30,000,000. In 1918 during the War period the department expended $62,000,000. Its activities were enlarged ostensibly to aid in the production of food supplies for our military forces, as well as those of our allies. In 1919, $49,000,000 were appropriated. In 1920, $50,000,000; in 1921, $47,000,000; in 1922, $54,000,000; in 1925, $60,000,000; in 1926, $58,000,000; in 1927, $71,000,000; in 1928, $69,000,000; in 1929, $84,000,000; in 1930, $88,000,000; in 1931, $134,000,000; and in 1932, approximately $110,000,000. I repeat, Mr. President, these enormous increases can not be justified. The personnel has increased until to-day there is an army of more than 28,000 persons serving in this department. The figures which I have given do not include appropriations for highways. The bill before us calls for nearly $200,000,000, more than $109,000,000 of which are to be expended solely for what is denominated the agricultural work of the department.

Mr. President, the depressed condition of agriculture has challenged the attention of Congress and has undoubtedly influenced committees dealing with agricultural questions to recommend legislation which it was believed would be helpful to the farmers of the United States. It is manifest that the deplorable condition of agriculture seriously affects all branches of industry. The prosperity of the Nation is largely dependent upon the prosperity of those who till the soil and produce the food supply of the people. In my opinion, however, the depressed condition of agriculture for the past few years has served as an excuse upon the part of many persons to exploit the farmers and to bring about additional Federal agencies ostensibly in the interest of agriculture, and to increase beyond all reason the number of employees in the department. There are many items in this bill that should be eliminated, and the expenditures of the department should be reduced to at least $75,000,000. If time permitted, I should like to examine in detail many items appearing in the pending bill and point out from the record how wasteful and unnecessary they are. I know, Mr. President, how impossible it is to successfully attack these items. The powerful hand of the Agricultural Department appears not only in Washington but throughout the country. Thousands of its employees and representatives in the various States oppose reductions, or any plan that contemplates the abolition of the agency or activity with which they are connected. I have received many letters protesting against the consolidation or abolition of bureaus or organizations, or a reduction in appropriations; indeed, many demands are made for increased appropriations in order that additional functions shall be performed by the department.

I recently read an excellent article by Mr. Merle Thorpe, editor of the Nation's Business, in which he discusses the rising costs of government and makes pertinent comment upon the same. He calls attention to the fact that in 1924 the legislative establishment of the Government expended only $14,000,000, but now $30,000,000.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Before the Senator from Utah proceeds with his comments upon the address to which he has referred, will he inform the Senate whether he has obtained any reaction as to the attitude of the average man throughout the country toward the reduction of governmental expenses?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I confess that I am somewhat bewildered by the contradictory reports brought to my attention.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to enlighten him about a very striking case that has been called to my attention?

Mr. KING. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. In one of the large factory towns of Massachusetts a town meeting was held a week ago to-day. Previous to the town meeting the finance committee of the town reduced the department estimates approximately 25 per cent. Great agitation prevailed in the town concerning the reduction of the expenses of the municipal government to a minimum. One week ago Monday night 1,500 voters, factory workers, small merchants, and private employees, many of them out of work, who heretofore have always voted for liberal salaries and increases in appropriation, crowded into the town meeting and swept aside the recommendation of their town officials and the finance board and voted sweeping reductions of 20 per cent in all salaries and all appropriations. So striking was the action of that meeting that the local newspaper, a copy of which I hold in my hand, reported the meeting under these headlines:

Voters cut 20 per cent from budget approved by finance committee.

Lacking leadership, annual town meeting reduces appropriations all out of reason and provides for future troubles.

Original town board requests cut 65 per cent.

I should like to read just a paragraph from the article itself. I quote as follows:

The annual town meeting held on Monday night resulted in an orgy of economy.

The finance committee, paring the budget to what it thought was the limit, and following last Thursday night's conference with department representatives issuing a supplemental reduction, saw the voters on motion to reduce its figures by 20 per cent. This followed action on an earlier article in the warrant by which salaries of elective officers were reduced 20 per cent.

It is not necessary to read further the details of the meeting. Here, however, was a determination upon the part of the voters to take the business of drastically reducing expenses of government into their own hands. So they crowded into that town hall, 1,500 of them, and demanded and brought about a sweeping reduction.

Personally I think those voters reflected the sentiment of the average citizen throughout the country to-day. In my opinion, the people of the United States are going to demand drastic reductions in expenses by the State and Federal Governments.

Mr. KING. Examples of the kind brought to our attention by the Senator are most encouraging. I wish they were more numerous. I regret that proper and appropriate pressure is not brought upon Congress to reduce appropriations and reorganize executive and administrative agencies so that they may function in a businesslike and proper manner. I have repeatedly stated that a taxpayers' strike might be expected and that the people might finally be aroused against the waste and extravagance and inefficiency not only of the Federal Government but of State and municipal governments. When it is recalled that the expenditures of the Federal and State Governments and their political subdivisions for the fiscal year 1932 exceed $13,000,000,000, one would expect that the people would organize for the purpose of compelling a reduction in expenditures, in order that the burdens of taxation might be lightened. Unfortunately, as I stated a few moments ago, before the Senator came into the Chamber, insistent demands are coming from some parts of the United States for increased appropriations by the Federal Government. My attention has been brought to the fact that in some localities where there have been demands for reductions in State and municipal taxes, and protests against any decrease in salaries of Federal employees, appeals have been forwarded to Congress for large appropriations, in some instances for purposes outside of the proper functions of the Federal Government. It is evident that there are many persons who desire Federal intervention in State, municipal, and individual affairs, and would welcome the extension of Federal paternalistic authority or an increasing socialistic development.

Perhaps the entire income of all the people of the United States for the present fiscal year will not exceed $60,000,000,000. With governmental expenditures approximating $13,000,000,000, it is obvious that the people are oppressed, and relief from the depression will be greatly delayed. I repeat that the proper course for the Federal Government and for States, counties, and cities is to cut appropriations to the lowest possible limit; to abolish unnecessary or duplicating agencies; introduce administrative reforms and practice the most rigid economy.

The wise and courageous course adopted by the British people is worthy of emulation. Confronted with a deficit, rich and poor alike united upon a policy of retrenchment and approved of increased taxes in order that the credit of their country might not be impaired.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I have been very much impressed with the unanimity of public sentiment in all the municipalities of my State, demanding and insisting upon just what the voters did in the town I have mentioned in the way of radical reduction in the expenses of government. In fact, the only place I observe where economies can not and dare not be accomplished is right here in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. KING. I am glad to learn of the wise and patriotic course pursued by the people of Massachusetts as stated by the Senator. His statement as to the situation in Washington, I am afraid, has support. Without being critical we have not been courageous enough in attacking Federal appropriations. It seems clear to me that the executive departments were too exorbitant in their demands for appropriations for the coming fiscal year. Their appeals to the Budget Bureau were far beyond all reason, and they resisted the suggestions made for valid and justifiable reductions. From time to time during the preparation of the Budget, statements were forthcoming from Executive authority claiming great credit for material and important reductions. When the Budget report was submitted it was apparent that the claims lacked validity. The executive department failed to present a proper budget, but on the contrary, it contained demands for at least $300,000,000 to $500,000,000 more than Congress should have been called upon to appropriate. The duty now rests upon Congress to slash and cut the Budget recommendations. This must be done in the interest of economy and efficient government and to maintain the honor and credit of the Republic.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to say that what the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] has said as to his experience with his constituents is exactly the same as my experience with my constituents. I think, without a single exception, every one who has written me on the subject of taxation—and many, many of them have—have supported a policy of economy.

Mr. KING. I return to Mr. Thorpe's statement to which I have referred:

The Department of Justice expended in 1924, $21,000,000. It is now expending $53,000,000. * * * In 1924 the Department of Commerce expended $21,000,000, now $49,000,000.

I might add that this remarkable increase was largely brought about in Mr. Hoover's administration of that department. The Agricultural Department in 1924 expended $121,000,000 and eight years later $330,000,000, a considerable portion of which, however, was for highways. The expenditures of the War Department have increased from $348,000,000 to $483,000,000 during the same period, and the Navy Department's expenses have increased from $332,000,000 to $378,000,000. The expenses of the Veterans' Bureau have been greatly increased.

My recollection is that for the present fiscal year they will amount to more than $900,000,000, not including more than $1,000,000,000 for adjusted compensation.

The Board of Tax Appeals, created only a few years ago, has increased its appropriation until its requirements are $650,000. The expenses of the Civil Service Commission have greatly increased until now they have reached $1,500,000. The expenses of the Employees' Compensation Commission have increased from $2,500,000 to $4,500,000, and the Board for Vocational Education, which expended $5,500,000 in 1924, received an appropriation of over $10,000,000 for 1932.

The Federal Farm Board, the creation of which is regarded as the chief triumph of the present administration, has expended no one knows how much, but its losses, it is believed, will exceed $250,000,000. Its expenses have been increased and demands are now being made by persons who have been the recipients of its favors that there be no reduction in the Budget to meet its operating expenses. I have received letters from various parts of the United States which bear the indicia of propaganda—and because of the similarity of language I am led to believe that they were more or less the product of a few minds—insisting that for operating expenses only $1,500,000 be appropriated for the Farm Board for the next fiscal year. There are many who believe that the Farm Board should be abolished and that its functions should be transferred to an appropriate bureau in the Agriculture Department. Representations have been made to me that the latter department has nearly 30,000 employees, many of whom live in the various States, and are familiar with the conditions of the farmers and the needs of agriculture.

It has been reported to me that an organization under the ægis of the Agriculture Department could more efficiently and more economically carry out the avowed purpose of the Farm Board act. Certain it is that much of the criticism leveled against the Farm Board, the Stabilization Corporation, and the Farmers National Grain Corporation is warranted. Mr. Legge, whose genius it was supposed would convert the Farm Board into a useful, safe, and sound organization, resigned, notwithstanding its deplorable condition, and when it had lost immense sums and was in a fair way to lose from two hundred to three hundred million dollars. Another member of the board, Mr. McKelvie, departed, but still the voice of criticism is heard throughout the land against the board's administration, and particularly against the enormous salaries paid to officials and to agents of subsidiaries of the board, or, if not its agents, should have been amenable to its control.

Returning to Mr. Thorpe's statement, the Interstate Commerce Commission in 1924 expended $5,000,000, now $9,000,000. May I interpolate that the Government appropriated a number of years ago a considerable sum to be expended in ascertaining the value of railroad properties. I regarded the measure as unwise. I think the first bill that I offered in the Senate when I came to this body in 1917, was a bill to repeal the act under which this appraisement was being carried forward. The claim was made that the work would be soon completed and that it would be unwise to abolish the organization when the end of its labors was in sight. Since then millions have been expended. I do not recall the total, but as I remember it is tens of millions of dollars. With changing conditions in transportation brought about in part by airplanes, trucks, and motor busses, it is apparent that railroad values have changed, some railroad lines have been abandoned, others will be, and that any values that railroads had 15 or 20 years ago form no criterion now, for the determination of values or for the fixing of freight and passenger rates.

Mr. Thorpe states that the Market News Service that cost only a few thousand dollars a year or two ago now costs $1,400,000. The Bureau of Plant Industry $2,500,000, now $5,500,000; the Forest Service costs have increased in a few years from $10,000,000 to $20,000,000. The Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, which a few years ago was operated for $2,000,000, now costs $5,000,000.

Mr. President, I opposed the creation of this bureau. I believe that our foreign activities should be under the State Department. We had a large and efficient Consular Service. There were men in the State Department, including, of course, those in the Consular Service, who had spent years in foreign countries and who were familiar with business conditions there prevailing. Many of them knew foreign languages. They had for years investigated business conditions and submitted annually more than 25,000 reports concerning business and economic conditions in the countries in which they served. These reports were brought to the attention of the public by the State Department and undoubtedly were of benefit to Americans engaged in foreign trade and commerce.

Mr. President, I protest against the enormous appropriations made for the Department of Commerce, and particularly for the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce. It is worthy of note that while we are spending not millions but tens of millions of dollars by way of subsidies to the shipping interests for the purpose, it is claimed, of promoting foreign trade, and are also spending millions of dollars in maintaining an expensive foreign service under the direction of the Department of Commerce, we enact tariff laws and promulgate restrictive regulations for the purpose of preventing trade and commerce with foreign nations. The Hawley Tariff Act contained rates higher than any act previously passed by an American Congress. It was an embargo upon thousands of commodities and imposed rates upon others that were so restrictive as to give to the domestic producer a substantial monopoly. Moreover, the Hawley Act created resentments and led to retaliatory measures, the effects, of which are daily becoming more apparent. Our exports, which for the two years 1919 and 1920 were approximately $16,000,000,000, have been reduced until for the fiscal year ending June 30 of this year they will be less than $3,000,000,000.

The aeronautical branch of the Department of Commerce spent last year, as I recall, more than $10,000,000, and the Bureau of Fisheries, which has not conserved the interests of the people in the fisheries of Alaska and along the Pacific coast, has increased its expenditures in the last four or five years from $1,300,000 to $3,000,000.

Mr. Thorpe states that the Department of Labor appropriations have increased from approximately "$4,000,000 in 1924 to more than $10,000,000 for the current year." The Employment Service, which was to have received but a modest amount for expenses, is now expending substantially a million dollars annually. The expenditures of the Interior Department have grown beyond all reason. I shall not discuss them now because that bill will be before us within a few days.

Quoting Mr. Thorpe:

> We have built up governmental machinery—State, local, and Federal—to a point where it costs $14,000,000,000 a year. To collect these taxes and to spend the money we have over 250,000 independent tax-gathering and tax-spending units in the United States to-day.

Mr. President, the applicants for positions in Government service, both State and National, are increasing, and tens of thousands of young men and women make earnest efforts to attach themselves to governmental organizations. Apropos of this statement I again quote from Mr. Thorpe:

> A former Cabinet member told me recently, half seriously: "I am raising my boy to be a Government employee. Not a clerk—that would limit his future. I want him to choose the work he does best. Should he show an aptitude for pedagogy or printing, operating barge lines or making bindery glue, running hotels or hospitals, farming, manufacturing or plumbing—in short, for any field of human endeavor—he will find the Government engaged in this work. For instance, should he go into the Post Office Department, he will not be limited to sorting and delivering mail. He may learn the express business, the insurance business, the savings-bank business, or he may learn to make locks or maps."

Not only the Federal Government, but the States, counties, and cities are greatly concerned in meeting these growing expenses. The heavy burdens of taxes do not meet the mounting costs of government. The Federal Government before Congress adjourns will be owing probably $20,000,000,000, represented, in the main, by tax-exempt securities. The outstanding bonds of the States and their political subdivisions will be nearly $20,000,000,000. These enormous sums, evidenced by tax-exempt securities, constitute a drain upon the people; interest charges must be met as well as annual provision to meet sinking-fund requirements. Money that should be devoted to industrial development and to the construction of mills and plants and to furnish employment is withdrawn from circulation and locked up in tax-exempt securities.

Hon. JOSEPH BYRNS, chairman of the Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives, in an article appearing in Current History for June, 1931, has presented figures that should not only challenge our attention but impress upon Congress the imperative necessity to reduce expenses and to balance the Federal Budget. He states that when Congress adjourned on the 4th of March, 1931, appropriations had passed the ten-billion mark for the first time in the history of the country, except in time of war. He states that during the first two years of President Hoover's administration appropriations for the Federal Government exceeded those made during the last two years of the Coolidge administration by $956,346,723.60. He further adds:

* * * The cost of government has risen so sharply during the last quarter of a century that taxpayers are beginning to wonder why and to ask if there is ever to be any easing of the tax load. * * * With the tax burden resting more heavily on the people, they are beginning to inquire why government must exact so much from them and whether they are getting 100 per cent value for their tax payments * * *.

He then quotes from an editorial as follows:

* * * Never in the history of the State has the public been so irate over the tax situation as at present. Any time you see a group talking together, you can depend on it that tax matters are getting an overhauling. It is getting so one shuns the morning paper for fear of reading about another tax proposal by the State legislature. There is just one ray of light in the whole picture—the fellow who pays no direct tax is learning that he pays taxes, after all, through the indirect tax. When that idea gets to the voter, we may expect an aroused citizenry to take a firm stand that taxes be lowered. * * *

He refers to the fact that the habit has developed of "holding Congress responsible for our spending orgy and of looking upon that body as the great national spendthrift." He then refers to the Federal Budget Bureau, created 10 years ago as an agency of the President for the purpose of reducing expenditures, and adds that—

* * * As things have turned out, however, it has been Congress and not the Budget Bureau that has trimmed the estimates. Despite the fact that appropriations by the Seventy-first Congress were approximately $10,250,000,000, they were $55,000,000 less than the sum the President and the Budget Bureau asked Congress to appropriate, and since the establishment of the Budget Bureau in the fiscal year 1923 its estimates, as approved by the President, have been reduced by Congress to the extent of $413,132,181.95. * * *

Much of the popularity of Mr. Coolidge grew out of the claim made for him that he effected economies and curbed the propensities of Congress to expend money. The fact is that the Budgets prepared during his administration received his approval, and he recommended that the appropriations therein called for be made by Congress. As stated by Representative BYRNS, Mr. Coolidge, as well as Mr. Hoover, have recommended larger appropriations than Congress was willing to make.

The fact is that demands of the executive departments have been in excess of their legitimate needs, and larger than Congress was willing to make. Mr. BYRNS states that the per capita cost of the Government in 1825 was but $3 and that there was no material increase for nearly a century. In 1890 the Federal expenditures were only $291,000,000, or $4.60 per capita, and the expenses of all the Government—Federal, State, and local—were $855,000,000, or $13.56 per capita. The average per capita expenditure for all the States in 1916 was $4.99, but in 1919 the State expenditures were 43 per cent greater than in 1915. In 1924 they were 165 per cent higher and for 1928, 219 per cent higher. He adds—* * * that if the present pace is maintained the cost of all government in the United States will be in excess of $30,000,000,000 for the next two years, or a per capita cost of about $125, or $625 for the average family of five. * * *

* * * With a population of 120,000,000 the per capita expenditure is about $42.50—

In the face of these facts Congress should resist the demands for Federal appropriations. One of the problems confronting Congress is to discover sources from which may be obtained revenue sufficient to meet the expenses of the Government, even when economically administered. There seems to be a misconception upon the part of the people as to the functions of the Federal Government; too many intelligent people regard the Treasury of the United States as a perennial fountain from which money flows to meet every appropriation bill enacted into law.

If the demands for appropriations were acceded to, it would be absolutely impossible to raise sufficient money, without confiscation, to meet the same. Already thoughtful people, whether rich or poor, are deeply concerned by reason of the enormous deficit of two and one-quarter or two and one-half billions of dollars for the current year and the certainty of as large or larger deficit for the next fiscal year unless taxes are materially increased. In periods of depression, if possible, there should be a reduction in taxes. Certainly the people are warranted in looking with apprehension and indeed with alarm upon an increase of burdens in periods such as those through which our country is now passing. Distressing as it is and oppressive as the results will be, Congress can not—it should not—adjourn until, by reducing expenses and imposing additional taxes, the Budget for the coming year will be balanced. Congress should reduce expenditures by at least $500,000,000. Even then additional revenues, amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars, will be required in order to avoid a deficit.

In the light of these facts Congress should reduce the Budget recommendations between three and four hundred million dollars. I think the reduction should be $500,000,000, and I shall be glad to vote in order that that goal may be reached.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

So Mr. MCKELLAR's amendment was rejected.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I desire to say that I voted for the last amendment with the feeling that it ought to be adopted and sent to conference, so that the item could be cut down. I think it ought not to be eliminated entirely, but I feel certain that a reduction could be made without impairing the service.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, and which I ask may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendment be read for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 24, beginning with line 23, the Senator from Tennessee moves to strike out all down to and through line 8, on page 25, as follows:

For all necessary expenses for the eradication of southern cattle ticks, $724,400: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used for the purchase of animals or in the purchase of materials for or in the construction of dipping vats upon land not owned solely by the United States, except at fairs or expositions where the Department of Agriculture makes exhibits or demonstrations; nor shall any part of this appropriation be used in the purchase of materials or mixtures for use in dipping vats except in experimental or demonstration work carried on by the officials or agents of the Bureau of Animal Industry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, the amendment proposes to strike out the provision on page 24, which reads:

For all necessary expenses for the eradication of southern cattle ticks, $724,400: Provided—

And so forth, the proviso relating to the use of the money.

I want to call attention to what the department has said about this matter:

The methods of eradication have been improved upon from time to time as new facts become known, and it may be stated that the methods have reached such a degree of perfection and have had such a wide, practical test that the question of how to eradicate ticks is no longer an essential part of the problem. The main part of the task is to have hearty, vigorous, and conscientious cooperation of the people. In other words, the work will progress just as rapidly as the people desire that it shall.

Now, listen to this sentence:

The Bureau of Animal Industry has received hundreds of letters from farmers and other interested persons, all residents of the southern territory which has been freed from ticks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I want to conclude just as soon as possible, but I think it is important to show something as to how this appropriation of $724,000 is spent.

There are 78 employees drawing $210,000 of the amount. I find here an item for traveling expenses of these employees amounting to $87,000, and I find a total of other expenditures of $150,810.

Mr. President, in this case splendid work has been done by the Government, but the work has been finished; the country is freed from the cattle tick, and there is no reason in the world for keeping this expensive bureau in the department. It is a willful waste of the people's money at such a time as this, when we are suffering from a great depression, and I hope the Senate will vote to strike out this provision.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, we have heard from the Senator from Tennessee as to the Southern section being freed of the tick. I should like to hear what other Senators from that section have to say about the matter. I understand the Senator from Tennessee now to say that the cattle tick has been totally eradicated?

Mr. McKELLAR. I quoted from the bulletin of the Department of Agriculture. I will read the extract again.

The Bureau of Animal Industry has received hundreds of letters from farmers and other interested persons, all residents of the Southern territory which has been freed from ticks.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It seems exceedingly strange, if that is the case, that the Department of Agriculture would be asking for three-quarters of a million dollars in order to continue the work.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I do not know to what extent the Southern section of the country is still infested with cattle ticks, but I do not believe that any other effort on the part of the Agricultural Department has been of more benefit to the country at large than has its effort to eradicate the cattle tick, resulting from its discovery of a method by which that could be done.

I live in the heart of the section that was infested with this deadly insect. I did not believe it was humanly possible, in view of the great numbers of ticks that appeared on individual animals, to eradicate the pests entirely, but agents of the department went down on my farm, and in three years they cleaned out every single tick, so that my cattle were just as clean as if they had come from a section of the country where the tick had never been known.

The particular tick is the species that carries what is known as the Texas fever. Now, my pasture and the pastures of my neighbors throughout that entire section are completely free of the pest. Before the work of eradication was undertaken it was unsafe to ship cattle into noninfested territory; the presence of the tick decreased the value of the cattle and made the animal unhealthy, and even in the case of animals which were immune from the fatal effects of the tick it lowered their vitality. That section, I repeat, has now been cleaned from that insect as though it had never existed; the tick has been eradicated. It is little short of a miracle.

I do not know what other sections of the country may be still infested, but I do say when it comes to dollars and cents in the form of raising meat for the market and producing healthy cattle in the sections that heretofore could only afford scrub cattle, that the value of the cattle has more than doubled and quadrupled.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Tennessee whether the State of Tennessee is absolutely free from the cattle tick?

Mr. McKELLAR. So far as I know, it is.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Does the Senator know that to be the fact?

Mr. McKELLAR. I can not state positively about it, but I have heard no complaint whatever about the presence of the cattle tick, and I take the department's word for it. The department says that our section is freed from it. I know of no section of the country that is now infested with cattle ticks.

By the way, while I am on my feet, will the Senator allow me to say a word further?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. The work done by the agents of the department is very simple. They show the farmers exactly how to dip their cattle, what material to use when the tick is present, and in that way clear the cattle of the tick. So there is no use in keeping this expensive bureau in Washington, appropriating $700,000, largely spent here in Washington, simply for the purpose of maintaining the bureau awaiting another plague to break out.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, I am very sorry that the Senator from Tennessee proposes to strike out this provision. He is not, I fear, informed as to the facts, and does not even seem to be sure whether or not Tennessee is free from the tick. How can the State of Tennessee or the State of Louisiana or the State of Texas or the State of Arkansas take care of a situation of this kind when the cattle go into interstate commerce?

The Federal Government assists every State in maintaining the service, but the Government does not pay the expenses; it furnishes the inspectors. The States and the local communities have to put up the money to pay the expenses of erecting the vats and furnishing the fluid for dipping the cattle and to do everything else connected with the process. The Government's agents are present, however, to see that the cattle are free from the tick after having been dipped. One of the greatest boons that ever were enjoyed by the South was the Government attempt to eradicate the cattle tick. In some communities, including the State of Mississippi, after resisting for some years, the people cooperated fully with the Government and they now have the best cattle in the South. The same thing is true of other sections which have cooperated with the Federal Government. They are producing as good beef cattle and dairy cattle as can be found in that entire section.

Mr. McKELLAR. I inquire if there are any cattle ticks in the Senator's State?

Mr. BROUSSARD. There are plenty of them.

Mr. McKELLAR. Has the Senator's State ccoperated in the work of eradication?

Mr. BROUSSARD. My State cooperated for many years and then went backward, due to conditions which could not be prevented. Those who were in control did not approve of the work; they wanted to have a no-fence law so that growers might raise the cattle on the public domain and on other people's property. So the past few years we have gone back instead of progressing. But we need this work done, and I am surprised that the Senator from Tennessee should offer an amendment to strike out this provision which enables us in territory surrounding the State of the Senator from Tennessee to have something done that is much needed, and which, in fact, is the one benefit that we are receiving down there which is helping us to build up a cattle industry.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. The Government has in the field experts in the work of detecting whether or not the tick has been eradicated. They inspect the cattle in infested regions, and after tests by experts they are able to declare whether on a given farm or in a given section the tick has been eradicated. A mere amateur or tyro could not possibly know whether that work had been finally accomplished; cattle growers might proceed for a year or two using the process indicated by the Senator from Tennessee, then desist, and perhaps in a year or two their cattle would be as badly infested as they previously were. It is an expert business, just as is the elimination of the Stegomyia and the Anopheles mosquitoes. Science discovered among the numbers of ticks the particular one which carries the deadly fever, and they have eradicated it.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I thank the Senator. I wish to say to those who do not know anything about the tick that there are a number of varieties, but there is only one that transmits the Texas fever. A certificate from an inspector in the State of Tennessee would not be accepted by any other State in the Union. A cattle raiser could not ship a single head of stock out of the State of the Senator from Tennessee without a certificate from the United States inspector. That is the only way protection is afforded. In Louisiana we had no market, and even in Tennessee they had no market, for cattle until the work of eradicating these ticks was begun.

If the cattle growers in the State of Tennessee were benefited by sharing in the contributions of the Federal Government and their cattle are freed of the tick—and the Senator does not seem to be sure as to that, but no doubt the State used all the money available and duplicated the Federal appropriation—and we who have failed at it because of lack of cooperation of those in authority want to continue so as to finish the work, I do not see why one whose State has benefited should want to cut us off.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I wish to state in this connection that we had a similar experience in Florida to that which the State of Louisiana has been going through. Some years ago when this work was started, and the suggestion was made that we had to eradicate the tick in order to have a better breed of cattle and develop the industry, there was considerable opposition to it. A great many cattle growers who had been feeding their cattle on the public lands and other lands objected to these steps being taken by the Government and to State cooperation; they fought it for a good many years; but finally practically every citizen in Florida, so far as I know, favored this eradication work, and it has done an immense amount of good. All the counties of the State, except about two or three, are now freed of the tick, and we created a new business by the development of the cattle industry; and throughout the whole South, where we have so many acres of what are known as cut-over lands, about all they can be devoted to is the raising of livestock. I quite agree with the Senator from Louisiana in advocating this item, and I am sorry the Senator from Tennessee takes the view that he does.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, only recently I made inquiry of the department concerning this matter. In my town there was a desire to erect a dipping vat so that the cattle could be shipped out of the State. Cattle can not be shipped out on the certificate of a local inspector; it is necessary to have the certificate of a United States inspector. I applied for and obtained suggestions as to the type of vat that should be built, and was given the plans and specifications. The Government was not paying a cent for the work, the people of the town were erecting the vats, and all the Government did was to furnish a man to give the cattle growers a certificate, such as is given in cases where plants are shipped from this city to any State in the Union. That is all that is involved, and the money that is being spent for this purpose is, so far as I am told and so far as I know anything about it, most wisely spent for the relief and aid of the farmers; there is no question about that.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, this infestation originally embraced all the Southern States. Instead of being eradicated now, it is only partially eradicated. It is found in all these States in certain sections, including Tennessee. There is about 20 per cent of the country that is left uncleaned.

Mr. President, this tick infests the cattle and brings about what is called splenetic fever, which is tremendously injurious to the animal. The scheme employed to combat it is simply to employ veterinarians, pay their traveling expenses, and give them the serum with which to inoculate the cattle and also the dip in which they wash the carcass of the animal. Then the inspector looks at the infestation in the county. He takes each county as a unit; and when all the cattle having the tick which brings about this fever are cleaned, the county then gets a statement from the Department of Agriculture that there is no infestation left. That county then can freely ship its cattle from county to county into the various States. That is what is called the quarantine feature of this work.

If we should abandon now the work which has gone on for 20 years in the cleaning up of this infestation, which has caused a tremendous loss to the Southern States in the cattle industry, in a very short time the whole of the South again would have this infestation and in a short time the livestock industry in that country would probably be in a more crippled condition than has even been known.

It is again surprising to me that some one living in the South and in Tennessee, where this infestation at one time was rampant, should stand on the floor of the Senate and want to abolish this commendable work that has been handled so skillfully and has been of such great value to the people of the South.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I should like to state to the Senate that a peculiarity about this insect is that when any animal that has reached adult age, or the calf of a cow that is immune, is poisoned by this tick it dies within 14 days. The cattle in the Southern States are immune from the fatal effects; but, if a carload of cattle from another section is shipped to any market and they are put in a yard where there are adult cattle that come from immune territory, whenever the tick poisons one of those nonimmune cattle it dies within 14 days; so that under those conditions we could not ship our cattle at all.

I remember that we purchased a thoroughbred cow and had her shipped down to our territory. We then did not know anything about the deadly effect of the cattle tick. We turned her in with our cattle and in 14 days, or about 2 weeks, she was dead from this terrible splenetic fever caused by being bitten by these ticks.

Mr. McKELLAR. There is no quarantine now against cattle in our part of the country.

Mr. SMITH. There is a quarantine from certain parts of the South for the reason that you can get a certificate that a certain territory within a State is immune, and the cattle from that territory can be shipped anywhere; but you can not ship from any territory in that section that has not been cleaned up by this process.

Mr. BROUSSARD. And then you must get a certificate that that county is clear.

Mr. SMITH. Certainly.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I do not care to consume much of the time of the Senate; but, in response to the suggestion of the Senator from Montana, I desire to say just a word with reference to this work.

I have in my hand a copy of the House hearings, which show the attitude of the Department of Agriculture, and I want to quote very briefly from those hearings:

> The States generally expend larger sums in this work than the amount appropriated by the Federal Government. That has been true right from the beginning.
> We are now 85 per cent through in tick eradication. The 1st of this December, 1931, we released 7 counties in Texas, 7 counties in Arkansas, and 7 counties in Florida, or a total of almost 17,000 square miles.

And, with reference to Louisiana:

> One parish in Louisiana was requarantined because of reinfestation with ticks.

That, no doubt, is because of the lack of cooperation which the Senator from Louisiana suggested.

The concluding clause in the statement of Doctor Mohler, who is the head of the Bureau of Animal Industry, is as follows:

> The State of Texas has been making more progress in the last 4 years than it did in 14 years before. These counties that I have just marked off in blue are the ones taken out of quarantine the 1st of this month, and the line above shows where the ticks were when we started this work.

This work has been making tremendous progress. The department will be through with it in a little while. The States spend a great deal more money on this work than the Federal Government, but the States can not quarantine against each other. The Federal Government establishes the quarantine, and the cattle are not allowed to pass the quarantine line except on the certificate of a Federal inspector. So, if this work is to go on at all effectively, this appropriation must be continued.

I am glad the ticks have been banished from Tennessee. I notice that the Department of Agriculture shows here that Tennessee had 42 counties, I believe, that were infested with ticks, and those 42 counties are now free. I am really amazed that the Senator from Tennessee should want to discontinue the work because, although Tennessee is free from the tick, unless it is destroyed in other sections it will be right back in Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the pamphlet I have here says that the entire southern country is free from these ticks. I have read it two or three times.

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, no! Here is the testimony of Doctor Mohler. The Senator from Tennessee knows Doctor Mohler, of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course.

Mr. CONNALLY. Doctor Mohler says they are 85 per cent free; and he gives a table in the House hearings showing the counties in the various States that are still infested.

This is a very useful work, and the Government will practically throw away the money that it has heretofore expended over a period of about 20 years, I believe, if it does not go ahead and make the eradication effective and thorough.

So I hope the Senator from Tennessee will not press this matter. He knows the blessings of freedom from ticks in his own State, and I hope he will not withhold those blessings from the rest of us. We are making progress. We are going to be in the same happy state as his own State if he will just let us alone for a little while longer.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, one word before we vote.

It will be found that these appropriations are just about the same from year to year. They have continued, year after year, for many, many, many years. This is one of the old bureaus in the Government, and it has done a good work. Its officials tell us that they have finished that work to the extent of 85 per cent. There may be a sporadic case here and there, but there is no reason in the world why the States can not take care of it.

The remarkable thing about this matter is that we are virtually expending as much for the remaining 15 per cent as we used to expend for the entire 100 per cent. We are keeping the same bureau and the same number of employees and the same expenses and travel pay of $85,000 a year to eradicate the cattle tick. It does seem to me that we have pursued this thing far enough.

From the other vote I judge that this vote is going to be in favor of the bureau. It just goes to prove that the Senate is not going to permit bureaus to be discontinued when they have once been established. Whenever the Federal Government establishes a bureau it is going to be continued. In some way the bureaus bring about enough votes to keep their appropriations going, and as long as appropriations are made the bureau is going to be continued.

There will be some excuse for the continuance of every one of the 27 or 28 useless bureaus that I discussed here last Friday. Some group of Senators in each section of the country will undertake to uphold those bureaus.

I have tried to be perfectly impartial about this matter. I first brought an amendment from the northern and western part of the country. Now I have brought this amendment from the southern part of the country. Both of these bureaus are useless. They ought to be abolished. We ought not to continue them. In this period of depression, as I have said before, with our Government $2,000,000,000 in the hole on running expenses, we ought not to keep these useless bureaus going on anywhere in the country—in my part of the country, in your part of the country, or in any other part of the country. We ought to abolish them. We can not cut down the expenses of the Government unless we do. We all know that; and I doubt if it is going to be possible for us to raise enough taxes to balance our Budget.

Talk about $1,200,000,000 balancing the Budget! It is all poppycock. We will be further in the hole next year than we are now if we raise $1,200,000,000 by additional taxes this year. We have spent $1,200,000,000 up to this good hour, and we have not appropriated a dollar for the running expenses of the Government, except some that we appropriated for deficiencies. We have already appropriated this year an additional $1,250,000,000. How are we going to balance the Budget with such extravagance as we have already shown?

We can not balance the Budget unless we cut down these expenses. I have sought out here and brought before the Senate the facts and figures showing that these are useless bureaus, that they are duplicating their work, that they ought to be cut out entirely or cut down almost entirely; but instead of accomplishing anything we find the Senate wedded to the bureaus.

I have no doubt that you Republicans will put in your platform next time, "Do away with bureaucracy! Reduce the bureaus of the Government!" You do not mean it. You have shown by your votes here to-day that you do not mean it. We Democrats for years have been talking about the useless bureaus of the Government. We have inveighed against bureaucracy; and yet, when it comes to a showdown, enough of us join with you to uphold the bureaus and keep them in the service of the Government. We do not mean what we say when we talk about bureaucracy in our party platforms. Several of these bureaus are useless bureaus.

My friend from Utah suggests that I offer an amendment cutting down this appropriation from $724,400 to $350,000. In order to test the Senate I am going to accept his amendment.

Mr. President, I desire to perfect my amendment before it is voted on by withdrawing the one I first offered, and offering a new amendment striking out the figures "$724,400" and inserting the figures "$350,000" for this bureau. That is ample for it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the order of the yeas and nays will be vacated, and the Senator from Tennessee will offer his new amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well. I do not think the yeas and nays have been ordered upon the matter; but I ask the Senate now to vote to cut down the appropriation. If they will not vote to strike it out when the department says that 85 per cent of the country that formerly was afflicted with this pest has been freed from it, surely the Senate ought to be willing to cut it down to $350,000.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BLAINE. In fixing the amount of $350,000, has the Senator taken into consideration whether or not that amount will carry out the essential work that may be necessary to eradicate these ticks?

Mr. McKELLAR. In my judgment, if $724,000 will look after the eradication in 100 per cent of the territory, $350,000 certainly ought to be enough to look after the eradication in the 15 per cent that is left. This matter is virtually under control. The State authorities could complete the work. The Government has shown in these bulletins just exactly what is to be done. It ought not to be required to send its experts to tell each farmer how to treat his cows in order to get rid of ticks.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to suggest to the Senator that it is not necessary for him to withdraw his amendment. His amendment proposing to strike out $724,000 and insert $350,000 is in order and will take precedence over the other amendment, because it is perfecting the text of the other one.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator himself suggested changing the amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. It has already been done. The change, striking out $724,000 and inserting $350,000, has already been permitted; so we will vote now on reducing the appropriation from $724,000 to $350,000.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator could have done that.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course it could have been done. It has been done. We might as well vote on it, and I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I am not wedded to any particular bureau, and if I were I would obtain a divorce if the grounds were sufficient.

I shall agree with the Senator from Tennessee and any other Senator in an effort to eliminate useless expenditures or to reduce excessive expenditures. I also agree with him that the only way to economize is to reduce expenses. But I think this appropriation constitutes an exception. I say that for this reason: No single State can complete this service and be certain of its permanence. Infected cattle may be taken from one State to another, and the work that has been accomplished would, in that event, be undone. It must be consummated in all the States before any State can rely upon the permanence of the system.

I think the cattle tick and the malaria mosquito constitute two exceptions. Any service which a State can perform within its own borders, by its own efforts, and at its own expense, any such service which a State can consummate, I think, ought to be left to the State; and the people of the United States ought not to be taxed to carry out an improvement or a service which is purely local, and which the State itself has ample power to carry out and perfect.

That is not true with reference to the cattle tick, nor is it true with reference to the malaria mosquito. One State might do its duty, might exterminate the pests 100 per cent, and yet an infection, disregarding State lines, might cross over and render a complete loss the work which had previously been done.

I may say, and be pardoned for saying, that I think this work ought to be speeded up. When I was chairman of the Committee on Agriculture years ago, year after year I made an effort to secure a sufficient appropriation to consummate this work without delay. There is no economy in delay. A waste of time is a waste of money, and this is one appropriation which might well be increased so that this work could be completed once and for all. I say that with reference to this and with reference to any other pest which can not be conquered by one State alone. Every place where the tick persists is a plague spot from which the infection would spread.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does not the Senator believe that if, instead of $724,000, we should make that $2,000,000 this year, this bureau would be back here next year asking for quite as much as they are asking for now?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I know that the dread of extinction is one of the deepest instincts in all department bureaus. They seem to be invested with immortality. I would like to see them exterminated when their work is done. I would like to see an amendment attached to this bill requiring the Secretary of Agriculture in his annual report to report the number of services which have been completed, and which can be discontinued in the future, and with respect to which appropriations can be discontinued, if such a novelty should ever arise in the course of departmental experience.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I have been in the Congress for something like 21 years, and I think the Senator from Oklahoma came before I did. Has he ever known in all his experience, or even in his lifetime, of a bureau once established being discontinued?

Mr. GORE. No; I knew of a case once where one came very nearly being extinguished, but it was not.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I am in favor of preserving necessary and essential services the Government should render to agriculture and to all other undertakings. I am not a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, or of the Committee on Appropriations, and therefore I desire to ask the Senator from Oregon, if I may have his attention, how long the department has been engaged in the work of eradicating the southern cattle tick?

Mr. McNARY. I think some 20 years.

Mr. BLAINE. What have been the former appropriations, so far as the Senator recalls?

Mr. McNARY. Seven hundred and forty-three thousand dollars is the appropriation in the current law. The appropriation in this bill is $47,000 less than the amount carried in the current law. It is also less than the estimate of the Director of the Budget.

Mr. BLAINE. Has that appropriation been carried in the various appropriation bills for a number of years, or about that amount?

Mr. McNARY. I do not recall. Sometimes there is a diminution and sometimes there is an increase, but I think the general average has been about $700,000.

Mr. BLAINE. Then, it seems to me that the logic of the Senator from Tennessee on the point he has been endeavoring to emphasize is somewhat erroneous. As I recall, the Senator stated that 80 per cent of the area where southern cattle tick prevailed had been cleaned up.

Mr. McKELLAR. Eighty-five per cent.

Mr. BLAINE. And that only 15 per cent remain infested. It seems to me that, according to the Senator from Oregon, the department has been 20 years in eradicating the southern cattle tick, accepting the statement of the Senator, in 85 per cent of the area, and that activity has been going on a long time, and that if we cut the appropriation now it would simply mean that it will be many more years before we eradicate the southern cattle tick in the remainder of the area. Of course, the Senator appreciates that if they remain in one area they will very rapidly spread to other areas; and if we are going to get rid of the pest, I can see no other way than to carry out the services necessary to rid the country of the pest, and therefore it seems to me that $350,000 does not measure the cost of that essential service.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me, I will tell him how long the department has been engaged in this activity. The bureau has been engaged in this eradication activity since 1907. Therefore they have been at it 25 years, and they have spent $13,695,595, and in their bulletin they argue that they have cleared the country of the cattle tick except for sporadic appearances, and I judge that that is true. They claim that 85 per cent has been cleared; and I am quite sure that if we appropriate $724,000 now, at the end of 10 years they will say that a certain percentage of the country is still infested and we will still be appropriating these large sums.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator that from the comparison he is making between the eradication that has gone on for this number of years, with an area of 85 per cent cleared, and an area of 15 per cent where the pest still exists, it seems to me we can not eradicate the pest in one year with $350,000. I do not know whether it can be done in one year for the amount that is asked or not, but, at any rate, it seems to me that we are simply pinching the pennies in cases of this kind, and that we will be doomed to the expenditure of additional enormous sums to take care of the area that is already cleared because of the infestation that will be transmitted to that area.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, just one word in reply to the Senator from Tennessee. If this service is cut, the cut will have to go on the item of supervision. The department says this:

> The work is conducted under the provisions of the rules and regulations of the interested States, the Federal appropriation being expended largely in supervising the activities, thus insuring the application of eradication measures which will result in the elimination of the tick and warrant the release of the cleaned area.

If we cut this appropriation it will not only mean that we will cut the Federal activities but we will cut the activities of every State, because the States can not supervise the Federal portion of the law.

The quarantine is a Federal quarantine. The States can no regulate it, and if we cut down the supervisory appropriation, then we are going to seriously impair the work of the States.

We have invested in this project millions of dollars. To stop it now would mean an absolute surrender of all we have invested, and the reinfestation of States like that of the Senator from Tennessee.

The work has been completed in all but portions of four States. Originally there were eight States the cattle in which were infested. The ticks have been eradicated from four of the States entirely, and from all of the remaining four except in some isolated areas.

While I sympathize with the Senator from Tennessee in his economy plea, it is not economy to throw away millions in order to save $250,000. It is not economy to stop a meritorious work because we are going to save a few dimes and a few nickels for the moment.

The senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], a distinguished cattleman, said to me to-day that no other act had ever been passed by Congress which had resulted in such great benefit to the livestock industry of the United States as this cattle-tick eradication, which has resulted in building up the quality of cattle and improved herds, getting rid of the old long horns. It has provided an increase for the national wealth and for the food supply, and it has been of national benefit. This is not local. The Senator from Tennessee knows the value of this service. He has had it in his own State. I ask the Senate to continue this appropriation.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I do not care to refer particularly to this item. The few remarks I make will be general.

I do believe that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN], who have spoken this afternoon about the necessity for retrenchment in Federal expenditures, are worthy of commendation. I am not referring to this particular item. It does seem to me that the time has about come when this body must find some items in some appropriation bills, some activities of the Government, which can be curtailed.

I do not regard it as a partisan move at all. I do not believe it should be so looked upon. It is a matter of national integrity. The taxpayers, State, municipal, and Federal, are laboring under a crushing and ever-increasing burden. The growth of Federal activities has been tremendous and continues in these times of depression as rapidly as in times of prosperity.

The Department of Agriculture along with other departments of the Government have increased their jurisdiction and their activities manyfold. I believe that the time has come on both sides of the aisle when we must cooperate in an effort to reduce the burdens of Federal taxation. It may not come at this session of the Congress. We may not realize how intense is the feeling at home upon the subject. I want to say that before the close of the next session of the Congress it will be brought home to every one of us that this is one of the great issues before the American people. We have been worried here year after year about prohibition and the liquor situation, about the World Court and the international situation, about the tariff. I say that more people in America are thinking and talking to-night about increased taxation, about the ever-growing activities of the governmental bureaus and commissions, about the burdens which they are unable to meet at tax-paying times, than are thinking in the aggregate about the liquor problem, about the World Court problem, and about the tariff situation which has divided the parties for so many years. This, in my judgment, with the exception of the unemployment situation, which is so closely akin and related to it, is the livest issue in America to-day. Let us not deceive ourselves.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. GLENN. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the Senator is very largely right. I have just returned from my home in Tennessee. There are more people talking about excessive taxation and about unemployment than all the other governmental questions put together.

Mr. GLENN. There is no doubt about it. There is no question about it. They are going now to meet the tax collector in almost every State in the Union unable to pay the taxes on their property. There are taxpayers' strikes in Iowa, in Illinois, and in other States of the Union.

I do not desire to make an extended argument at this time, and I am not talking about the particular item of the bill now pending. I say the time is coming when we must meet this issue. There is only one way to meet it.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. GLENN. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator comes from the State where all the great stockyards are located.

Mr. GLENN. I come from the State where many of them are located.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does not the Senator realize the value of this particular service?

Mr. GLENN. As I said, I am not criticizing this particular item, and I tried to make that clear.

I think the most popular thing, and perhaps the most worthy thing, that the President of the United States could do to-day would be to send out the word that there must be the most drastic curtailment in the activities of the Federal Government and the strictest economy in every department over which he has jurisdiction and control.

I repeat that, in my judgment, the time has come when we must take almost every item in every appropriation bill and say, "This must be subjected to the closest scrutiny." There will never be an item in any bill which will not be ably defended and about which there is not much argument for its justification. But the time is almost at hand, as I have said. If it does not come within the next three months before the adjournment of this session of the Congress it is certain to come at the next session of this body when we will find, I confidently predict, that the greatest issue of all will be the question of Federal economy, the abolishment and curtailment of the ever-growing, ever-increasing and ever-spreading activities of the Federal Government.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. GLENN. Certainly.

Mr. COUZENS. I wonder if the Senator from Illinois voted for the $1,000,000 appropriation for the Chicago World's Fair which was contained in the bill now before the Senate?

Mr. GLENN. I supposed that question would be asked, of course. I did not vote for it. I was not present at the time.

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator did not approve of it?

Mr. GLENN. This inquiry is not original with the Senator from Michigan. The same question was asked the other day by the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS]. I never have said a word for that item in committee or on the floor, and my statement is in the RECORD.

Mr. COUZENS. What I was trying to ascertain is whether the Senator does not think it would be well to reconsider the action on that item and cut it out of the bill?

Mr. GLENN. If the Senator wants to ask for a reconsideration of that item, it is his privilege. He is simply trying to embarrass me about an item for which I have never spoken at all. The suggestion is not at all original with the Senator from Michigan, but came from the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] in an evident attempt to embarrass me. The Senator may do or attempt to do with that million-dollar item just as he pleases. I have never spoken for it at any time or any place.

Mr. COUZENS. Of course the Senator from Michigan would do it if he chose without the consent of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. GLENN. Of course he would, and especially if he thought it would embarrass at all the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, the first time my attention was ever directed to the tick question was about 1896 in the Supreme Court of the United States. The issue there was a question of damages in a case that came up from the State of Texas, where one party was suing another for the inoculation of his cattle herd with ticks. As the argument of the case proceeded in the Supreme Court, finally one of the justices wakened over at the end of the bench and stopped the attorney in the course of his argument by inquiring, "Did those ticks fly?" Even the Supreme Court of the United States did not know whether ticks have wings, and I fear the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] does not know yet either.

So far as the ticks are concerned, I think they ought to be eradicated, although we do not have them in my State, and there will be no benefit to my State from this particular item of appropriation. But we will help to pay the taxes out of which the appropriation will be made. We do not pay much of a Federal tax out in Iowa. There are only 27,000 people in the whole 2,500,000 in Iowa who pay any income tax into the Treasury of the United States. In fact, the expenses of the United States are paid by the people who first tax the rest of the people of the country in excess profits.

During prosperous times our national income is about $90,000,000,000. In 1930 it was $71,000,000,000. Ninety billion dollars is $750 for each man, woman, and child in the United States, or about $3,750 for each family of five. Seventy-one billion dollars is $580 for each man, woman, and child in the United States, or about $2,900 for each family.

Then in 1931 the national income, on the estimate of the National Industries Conference Board, was $54,000,000,000. The question is, Who got that income? Where did that income go? Who levied that tax upon the people first to get that vast income? That is $442 for each man, woman, and child in the United States, or about $2,210 for each family. But it was not distributed in that way. The trouble is and the question in this country is not going to be so much what Federal taxes are, but it is going to be what the profiteering taxes are upon the people of the country. So far as the tax question on its merit is concerned, three-fourths of it is a State proposition. The Federal taxes are only about 25 per cent of all the taxes collected in the United States. That 25 per cent is collected from the people who ought to pay taxes.

The heaviest tax upon Iowa is levied by the city of Chicago and the city of New York in the profits that we must pay to those people through the various financial arrangements that take the earnings of our people away from our States. That is the issue with our people. We do not object to collecting back a portion of those taxes in order to distribute again in some way the wealth of the country back to where it belongs.

The big taxpayers who pay into the Treasury of the United States collect from the whole country all the time. The American Telephone & Telegraph Co. is reported in the newspapers to have earned more in profits in 1931 than in any year in all its history. So far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing to tax that kind of activity to eradicate ticks or to fight any of the other calamities which the scientists of the Department of Agriculture are investigating.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am not one of those who find fault with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] or the Senators supporting him who are leading the fight to eradicate this item, although I do not agree with him and expect to vote against him. We can not disassociate his amendment from the general proposition that the Government is running behind and that in every possible way it ought to economize.

We realize that in bringing about that economy we will have to do a great many things that we do not want to do, both in the levying of taxes and in refusing to make appropriations. Nevertheless we ought to try to operate the Government the same as we would operate a great private business institution. If we were operating a business corporation entirely upon business principles, we would not always cut out appropriations even when temporarily our great corporation was running behind. It is not economy always to refuse to appropriate money. Sometimes the greatest economy can be brought about by doing things in times of depression that we do not do even in times of prosperity. If we knew now that prosperity had fled forever and that the depression was going to last indefinitely, we would do a lot of things that we would not do if we believed that the depression is temporary in its nature. I think most of us agree that eventually we will find ourselves in a situation that will convince us that the depression is not going to last always. We ought to be careful that we do not do something during the depression that is going to increase by a vast amount the taxes we will have to levy when prosperity returns.

The cattle-tick question is a national proposition. I am not sure that we will ever get rid of it.

I want to say to the Senator from Tennessee that, so far as I am concerned, I am not offering any assurance that when the work shall have been done 100 per cent throughout the country we can even then cease making the appropriation. The cattle tick still may be, and I am inclined to think it always will be, with us. We can reduce the appropriation after a while, no doubt, but would it be economy now to cut down the appropriation and cripple the work or stop it altogether?

If we did that, would we not live to see the day when we would regret it, because, as everyone knows, unless proper supervision is had, the cattle tick is going to spread? It knows no State boundaries; and the people all over the country are interested in this item; everyone, I think, who eats meat is interested in it. Unless we eradicate the cattle tick, or get it under complete control, it is likely to break out anywhere on account of cattle being shipped from one section of the country to another. Cattle are never shipped from Texas to New York or Nebraska or Minnesota but that there are people interested in that shipment at both ends of the line. The man to whom the cattle are shipped in some other State is just as much interested as is the man who ships the cattle from a Southern State. If, because of the presence of the tick, a grower can not ship his cattle from certain sections, his business is almost ruined. While the section of the country to which the cattle would otherwise be shipped may not be injured, the section from which the cattle would be shipped is damaged; and such a condition has a tendency to increase the price of meat to the consumer, no matter where he may live.

I think the Senator from Tennessee, in calling attention to this and other items, is doing an excellent work, even though we do not agree with him in what he thinks ought to be done in the case of this item or some other item.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I wish to make a brief statement in line with the argument the Senator is making. A great many cattle on the Gulf coast, including the State of Louisiana, are shipped to his State, to Iowa, and to other States for grazing and feeding purposes before they reach the market. We can not ship those cattle unless they are inspected and certified by a Federal agent.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; and the Federal Government, as I look at it, is the only instrumentality that can properly make the inspection.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Let me suggest further, suppose we were to ship cattle that were infected and they were placed with a herd in Nebraska or Iowa, what would be the result?

Mr. NORRIS. It would mean ruin to the herd in Iowa.

So, Mr. President, while everybody wants to be economical, it seems to me this is an item where we can not afford to cut down the appropriation. If the work of eradication which has been going on should be stopped—and the work will stop if this appropriation shall not be made—the spread of the cattle tick would be appalling; it would extend to all parts of the United States and do hundreds of millions of dollars of damage, beside making it more expensive and more difficult in the future to eradicate the pest when the work shall again be undertaken.

Nobody claims, so far as I have ever heard, that we ought not to do everything necessary to eradicate the cattle tick. The whole United States is interested in it, either directly or indirectly. I myself do not know of my own knowledge whether the amount proposed in the bill is sufficient; but as I look at it, employing business methods, the department would be able to use almost any reasonable amount of money, and the more money that was appropriated the further the work of eradication of the tick could go.

There are other items, in my judgment, as to which we can much better afford to be economical and to cut down appropriations than this item. I am not going to try now, Mr. President, to enumerate many of them that occur to me, but I shall have something to say about them when other appropriation bills come before the Senate. I hope, however, the Senate will not be misled by pleas of what I believe to be false economy and fail to appropriate for a work in which the whole country is interested and which can not be carried on by any other instrumentality except the Federal Government. It is perfectly apparent that no State could do this work, but the Federal Government doing it every State is bound by the Federal regulation, and the effect is that the regulation is obeyed by all the States, and the certificate of the inspector is sufficient, when properly given, to enable the people in one section to ship cattle to another section and to have it there received.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Along that line, is it not true that the Federal Government had finally to step in to do this work? If in the beginning of the tick infestation the Federal Government had not intervened, the cattle industry would have been killed?

Mr. NORRIS. If the Federal Government had remained out of the field, the tick would have covered the country and would have brought ruin to the cattle business; but, regardless of whether one raises cattle or not, he is interested in the item in some way. Everyone is interested in the cattle business; and there would have been absolute chaos if the Government had not stepped into this work. We can not afford to stop it, it seems to me, without there being offered any promise or suggestion that further effort to eradicate the tick will be unnecessary. We may have to continue the work always, and I am inclined to think, in some degree, that we shall be compelled to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, MARCH 7, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Heavenly Father, in the name of Thine only begotten Son we wait in Thy presence. In Him we have the one perfect example and rule of conduct. When our faith falters and we drift, when our vigilance ceases and we stumble, when temptation is nigh and we face an emergency, in Him we have a refuge. We thank Thee that He belongs to human necessity and to all mankind. He endured the awful night that we might become the children of the day. Sublime was His sorrow that we might have joy unspeakable and full of glory. Bless our country; break down all barriers of unholy and unpatriotic alliances; cast up the way that we shall be able to withstand the rage of malice, the spleen of social hate, and the tyranny of lawlessness. O God, our Father, save the Nation's lost child. Through Christ our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, March 5, 1932, was read and approved.

THE KIDNAPING OF THE LINDBERGH BABY

Mr. NELSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. NELSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, my attention has been directed to a statement by the Secretary of Agriculture, who, in replying the Senator ROBINSON of Arkansas, finds fault with me. While my name is not mentioned, the Missouri member of the Cabinet refers by title to an extension of my own remarks in the RECORD on last Friday, when, having in mind the great sorrow that had come to the Lindbergh home and to the entire Nation, I received unanimous consent to insert a brief article from my own pen entitled "Babies and Daddies." It dealt not with baby bonds but with baby boys. In to-day's RECORD, I suspect, there will go copy of an address dealing with baby bonds. Nobody will object, yet the Nation is to-day more interested in baby boys, in one baby boy, than in all the baby bonds that the public can buy.

It is not my thought to at this time find fault with any act or statement of Secretary Hyde, for surely there are two subjects in the discussion of which politics should never enter—childhood and the church. Sincerely do I wish, however, that while the Congress is hoping for the speedy passage of a bill to provide proper punishment of kidnapers, if in fact there is any proper punishment, we might have had Mr. Hyde's complete cooperation rather than criticism of my work. With Senator PATTERSON, of Missouri, and Representative COCHRAN of Missouri leading the fight for this measure, I entertain, perhaps without warrant, the hope that the publication of my little article dealing with father and child love might help. If such is the case, if lads and dads here and there throughout our country are brought closer together, and if others are made to realize the cruelty of the crime of kidnaping, I shall feel amply repaid, despite any criticism from the Missouri member of the Cabinet.

I mentioned the fact that two Missourians, Members of the Senate and House, and representatives from the one State where kidnaping is a capital crime, are in the forefront of the fight for this long-needed legislation. There are other reasons why Missourians, especially, are deeply concerned. It was the plane The Spirit of St. Louis that took Col. Charles Lindbergh on his world-famous flight. The Jefferson Memorial Building in St. Louis now contains the most complete collection of Lindbergh trophies. Yes, and when there was born little Charles A. Lindbergh, jr., baby boy for whose safe return every creed and every church now unite in prayer, the home State of the father was given as Missouri.

I should not ask privilege to reply but for the fact that the criticism directed at me by Secretary Hyde leaves the reader in doubt as to the House Member referred to. I wish to take full responsibility. I know the feeling of the people of Missouri, the State where love of little folks has ever been finest and where fatherhood and motherhood have been exalted; State of Gene Field, poet of childhood. I repeat that mine and mine only is the mistake, if by inserting in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a reference to the finest of all partnerships—that of father and son—if referring to children instead of corporations, if by extension of remarks not purely political, I have erred.

But I do not believe that the finest sentiments of life are lacking in this House. I know they are not, and I want the Nation to know. All will be the better for that knowledge. It will create confidence when it is known that occasionally we pause to speak of those values not to be measured in money.

Not so many years ago a golden-locked lad came occasionally into this Chamber, so Members then serving have related, and sat by the side of his father, then a Member of this House. The years, not so many in number, went by, and the lad, yet a boy in appearance, but bravest of the brave, and unspoiled by the honors of the world, came again into this Chamber here to receive high honors from a people proud of his accomplishments. Small wonder is it then that this House, that every Member, has sorrowed with Colonel and Mrs. Lindbergh in their days of indescribable distress.

Tears came to my eyes as I read from the pen of Will Rogers, who, like Charles Lindbergh, is world famous and loved by the home folks, a description of his most recent visit in the Lindbergh home, when the father, all forgetful of fame, got down on the floor and played with his little lad, just as many of us have played with ours.

I have said that sentiment is not dead in this House. I know it is not dead when I think of that Member who on a given day in each year, the anniversary of the going away of his little son, wears a flower in the lapel of his coat; I know sentiment is not dead when I think of the Member who has told me how, hoping to forget in part the grief that came with the passing of his boy, went at the suggestion of his physician around the world, only to come back and find that there are sorrows that time alone can heal; I know sentiment is not dead when I think of that colleague who for years has carried in his pocket a picture of the boy who went away to be with God; I know sentiment is not dead as I recall the devotion and faith of a father, a Member of this House, who, while enjoying a vacation with me on a Missouri lake last summer, learned of the accidental death of his son in a distant State; I know sentiment is not dead when I think of another Member, who for many years and until his aged mother's death, continued the beautiful custom of calling her over long-distance telephone each Sunday afternoon, and at a given hour; I know sentiment is not dead when I think of the grief of one of our own Missouri Members, who only a few days ago stood at the grave of his little grandson, a child he had idolized.

I would have the Nation know that those who have occupied the Speaker's chair, big as they have been, have not been too big to have hearts that are tender. I think of Speaker Champ Clark, big-hearted, beloved Missourian, whose passing was hastened, not by political defeat but by the death of a little grandson, his namesake. I recall the kindly good-by and the hearty good wishes for my own boy as uttered by genial Speaker Nicholas Longworth as at one Christmas time he was leaving the train in a Cincinnati suburb, while I continued on to my Missouri home. Especially happy am I to say that never has the Speaker's chair in this House been occupied by a more generous-hearted, more sympathetic, more human man than JACK GARNER. Proof of this came to me two weeks ago when I was called home by the illness of my own mother. Busy man as he is, the Speaker took time to write a brief letter, in which he expressed love for his own aged mother and the hope that my mother might recover.

Then I know that sentiment is not dead in this House so long as mothers are here. In fact, this sentiment is now stronger than ever before because of the presence of the honored women Members.

It must be that in their grief Colonel and Mrs. Lindbergh have found some satisfaction in the thought that they are not alone, that hearts everywhere beat with theirs, and that while the search for their own little son continues the Congress of the United States is pushing forward legislation designed to make for greater safety for other children. What would they not give to-day to have their child home again, to listen to childish prattle and feel again the tender touch of baby hands! How terrible must have been their sorrow throughout last night with its snow and storm.

I repeat that sentiment is not dead. If it were, we might as well strike from our coins the words "In God We Trust"; lower the flags from this Capitol Building; destroy the original copies of the Constitution of the United States and the Declaration of Independence in yonder Library of Congress; and close forever the gates of Mount Vernon, so that no American might again stand with uncovered head before the Tomb of Washington. For when ends sentiment, then will end the Republic.

If true that extension of my remarks in the RECORD cost $56.20—$56.20 in appreciation of childhood as contrasted with $2,000,000,000 in aid of corporations—I would answer that in all our land there is not one little lad who isn't worth more than that amount, an amount which Colonel Lindbergh would multiply a thousand times if it would but bring back his own precious boy.

FEDERAL KIDNAPING LAW

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech I delivered over the radio on Thursday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a speech delivered over the Columbia Broadcasting System Thursday, March 3, 1932.

Ladies and gentleman of the radio audience, I am indebted to the Columbia Broadcasting system for this opportunity to explain the bill I have introduced making it a capital offense to kidnap a person and move, or cause to be moved, that person from the jurisdiction of the State wherein the person was kidnaped.

I can appreciate why some Members of Congress oppose the enactment of this bill because there is no Member who has more vigorously opposed the efforts to centralize power in the Federal Government than I have. However, we are confronted with a situation that the State police are unable to control, especially along the borders of a State. My own city, St. Louis, being situated on the river that bounds Missouri and Illinois, is an outstanding example.

The class of people engaged in kidnaping and holding citizens and children for ransom are experts in their line. They do not act upon the moment, but for weeks in advance they plan, they prepare, they go into every detail. The seizure of their victim, the selection of the place or places where the victim will be detained, the method to follow in collecting the ransom, as well as the final step of releasing their victim. Nothing is left undone. Every member has his or her part to play and seldom do they make mistakes.

The original States gave to the Federal Government the power to regulate commerce between the States. When a State is admitted to the Union that State agrees to be subject to the Constitution and among the provisions of the Constitution is the right of the Federal Government to regulate commerce. The police powers of the various States are limited to the boundaries of the individual States. In other words, the police of Missouri have no jurisdiction in the State of Illinois. The police of New York or Pennsylvania have no jurisdiction in New Jersey. Knowing this the kidnapers, say, for instance, in St. Louis, immediately upon seizing their victim drive across the Mississippi River to Illinois, for they know that the St. Louis police are powerless to act in that State.

The chief of police of St. Louis, Col. Joseph Gerk, recently testified before the Committee on the Judiciary of the House, and in his testimony he related how he could get no help from enforcement officers in other jurisdictions. He spoke of other States, in which States, he was reliably informed, kidnapers had assembled or were holding their victims. The chief of police did not make the charge, but one member of the committee went so far as to say that in some instances the kidnapers probably had corrupted certain State officers before they started on the job and, at its completion, rushed back to that locality with their victim, knowing that they would be protected. Where there is restriction of authority due to geographical boundaries there develops just such a situation as requires that certain powers now vested in the Government be used if it can be legally done.

Let us take the case of the child of Colonel Lindbergh that is to-day being discussed in every corner of the globe. Here is an instance where such a law as I am asking to be passed could be used most effectively. The child was kidnaped close to the New Jersey border line. Say the New Jersey State police are on the job and have information that the baby is being taken toward New York. They follow the trail, arrive at the State line, and there the jurisdiction of the New Jersey police ends. If we had a Federal law to cover kidnaping, a Department of Justice agent could be called upon to aid the police, and when the State line was reached he could proceed across the boundary, take the pursuing police with him, and follow the criminals. This because the Federal jurisdiction did not stop at the State line. As it is now the pursuing police must stop at the State line. They must contact the local authorities of the adjoining State, who would then take up the trail.

Early yesterday morning the President, through the Attorney General, placed Department of Justice agents at work on the Lindbergh case and instructed them to make every effort to apprehend the kidnapers. Everyone will applaud the action of the President, but I can tell you he acted without any authority of law. I seek to give that authority in my bill.

It is not always Colonel Lindbergh's child that is kidnaped. God knows I would never object to the President taking this action. I commend him even though he had no authority. But yesterday another child was kidnaped, this time in Ohio. What I seek to do is to assure every mother that her child will be accorded the same attention from the Government of the United States as the President provided in the Lindbergh case.

Dear as this baby is to Mrs. Lindbergh, he is no dearer to her than any other child is to its mother, no matter how humble that mother's station may be.

Would you, who have seen the shadow of death to bring into this world your dear baby or babies, want brave officers stopped at State lines because of red tape, professional jealousy, or for any cause, or do you want a situation where State lines are no barriers? Do you want ferreted out that lowest of all criminals regardless in what State he or his foul companions seek refuge? Of course you do, and that is just what I am trying to do by my bill.

You also want to feel that your husband, your father, yes, even a wife or mother, will not be starved, beaten, possibly killed, because State lines are a barrier to the pursuit.

No one asks that the Federal Government take over the police work of the State; all that is asked that the Congress provide a way for the State police to accompany a Federal agent into an adjoining State so that the criminals may be apprehended. The Federal agent will be in control once the State boundary is crossed. He will have no jurisdiction if the victim remains within the border of the State.

Why, my friends, when the victim is in the hands of the kidnapers they dispatch letters through the United States mails, by special delivery or otherwise, demanding ransom and threatening to do bodily harm to the victim if their demands are not complied with. Think of it, using the United States mails to further their purpose. Why are they so brazen? Because, as I have stated, they are smart; they know there is no Federal law under which they could be prosecuted. They can threaten a juror or witness in a State court through the use of the mails, but are immune from punishment. They can write you a letter and say if you do not meet their demands they will kidnap your child or destroy your home with a bomb. You can have them arrested, but if they have not harmed you or your property they will be released because of the absence of a Federal law making it a felony to send a threatening letter through the mail. As the kidnapers use the mails, I introduced a bill to take care of that situation.

I am pleased to say a House committee reported my bill favorably Wednesday. It is going to become a law, and then if the mail is used for such purposes the sender of the threatening communication can be sent to the penitentiary for from 2 to 20 years and be fined from $1,000 to $5,000. When that bill becomes a law it will be of aid in apprehending kidnapers.

Several of the States have drastic kidnaping statutes, but what use are these statutes if the criminals get beyond the State lines. Of what use are these if New York, New Jersey, or your State can not bring witnesses from one State to another to testify and convict the kidnaper. We all know that the power of the State to compel the attendance of witnesses stops at its State line just as its police are stopped. My bill will take care of this. The criminal can be prosecuted under my bill at the place he seized the baby, the father, husband, mother, or whoever be the victim. He can also be prosecuted in any State he or they passed through in flight with his or their victim. Prosecution can be had at the place of kidnaping or the place of release, or any place between the two; and, best of all, witnesses can be compelled to attend and testify.

The intimidation of witnesses is another important factor. Even after apprehension it is known that friends of the criminals, criminals themselves, make life miserable for those who are to appear before the court. They are known to have subjected witnesses to torture, as one of the witnesses told the committee, such as lowering them down into water, shutting off their wind, showing them rags saturated with gasoline and sprinkling it on the floor, and threatening to put them into vats of lime if they submitted testimony that would injure those under indictment.

I say to you that if these criminals know that the Government will take a hand, and can take a hand, the fear of Uncle Sam will cause them to abandon this lowest of all crimes.

The peace and security of the citizen is guaranteed by the Constitution, and it is the duty of Congress to see that its citizens are secure from attacks of this character.

I predict that the crime wave that has swept the country for nearly 15 years, terminating, you might say, in the foulest of all crimes, that of kidnaping, will start descending from the peak now reached when my bill is enacted.

Never before in the history of our country have the people been so aroused as they are to-day.

As evidence of this I read a telegram just received from the Board of Education of St. Louis:

"The kidnaping of the infant child of Colonel Lindbergh has greatly increased the sense of uneasiness and horror that the country has frequently and increasingly experienced on account of kidnapings. Steps toward the eradication of this crime by the employment of all of the means within the power of the Federal and State Governments is therefore, in our judgment, a measure of paramount importance to our people. We accordingly heartily approve legislation that outlaws kidnaping in the eyes of the Federal law as well as that of the States. We express to you also the hope that the Congress, by accepting this view, will approve the legislation that you have proposed.

"BOARD OF EDUCATION,
"HENRY J. GERLING, Superintendent."

I say when the time arrives that mothers fear to send their children to school, then the time has arrived when thoughts of State rights and centralization of power must be forgotten; then, I say, we must go back to the thought of preservation of the family, the foundation and unit of all government of all civilization.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on to-morrow, after completion of business on the Speaker's desk, I be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois, Mr. RAINEY, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. SNELL, are both present. At the beginning of this session of Congress it was suggested by the Chair himself, and agreed to by the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. RAINEY, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. SNELL, that the better policy is that if Members desire to address the House they should ask unanimous consent on that day; that to ask unanimous consent to speak at some future date may complicate matters. I simply call that to the attention of the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. RAINEY, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. SNELL. It is the province of those gentlemen to conduct the affairs of the House as they see proper.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand that on to-morrow the anti-injunction bill will be taken up; and, if that is so, I hope the gentleman from Alabama will withdraw his request, because there are four hours' general debate on the bill.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I will modify my request, although it is not entirely convenient to me. I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to address the House to-day for 30 minutes. It is possible that I may be able to get along with less time, but I would like time to talk on a banking bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

BLANTON-LA GUARDIA RADIO DEBATE ON PROHIBITION

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a speech delivered on last Saturday evening over the radio by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman from Kentucky what he intends to do with the other half of the speech? [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. I ask unanimous consent that the remarks of Mr. LaGUARDIA be printed in connection with mine.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, in accord with unanimous consent granted me by the House of Representatives, I extend my remarks in the RECORD by incorporating the speeches made by Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON, of Texas, and Hon. FIORELLO H. LaGUARDIA, of New York, last Saturday night over the national coast-to-coast hook-up of the Columbia Broadcasting system:

SPEECH OF HON. THOMAS L. BLANTON, OF TEXAS

Good evening, everybody: The eighteenth amendment is a legitimate part of our Federal Constitution. It is the result of 100 years of prayers, sacrifices, and uncompromising efforts on the part of the fathers and mothers of America. It was passed according to law. Only according to law can it ever be repealed.

In my 11 minutes I hope to convince drys that it should not be repealed. I can't convince wets. Only the omniscient, omnipresent, omnipotent Almighty God can change them.

Just preceding prohibition the United States Senate printed its committee's report in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on January 16, 1919, certifying that its Senate investigation of the liquor traffic clearly established that the brewers and distillers had furnished large sums of money to secretly control newspapers, periodicals, primaries, elections, political organizations, legislators, and National and State officials and in exacting preelection pledges from candidates; that the brewers had partly subsidized the public press and authors of recognized standing, had organized clubs, leagues, and corporations to execute their will, had coerced drys and boycotted unfriendly mercantile businesses.

Could there be a stronger indictment? Brewers did all that when they had saloons. They now are doing all that and more to bring back saloons. For inevitably any repeal or return to beer means the return of saloons. Where brewers formerly spent thousands lobbying they now spend millions. They are desperate. They maintain the most powerful, arrogant, expensive, domineering lobby known to history. With the daily help of such wet organizations as the Association Opposed to the Prohibition Amendment, the Crusaders, the Constitutional Liberty League, the Moderation League, the Federation for Prohibition Reform, and many others, it unfairly attacks, threatens, abuses, ridicules, misrepresents, and attempts to brow-beat and intimidate every dry who dares to oppose it.

President Hoover spent $500,000 on his Wickersham Commission. After months of exhaustive investigation it agreed upon four decisive conclusions, namely:

(1) The commission is opposed to repeal of the eighteenth amendment.

(2) The commission is opposed to the restoration in any manner of the legalized saloon.

(3) The commission is opposed to the Federal or State governments, as such, going into the liquor business.

(4) The commission is opposed to the proposal to modify the national prohibition act so as to permit manufacture and sale of light wines and beer.

Only Monte Lemann did not sign the conclusions. Even he said he did not favor nullification, or leaving the matter to Congress. He said no improvement would result from an amendment permitting light wines and beer, for if the liquor were not intoxicating it would not satisfy. The 10 who signed the conclusions embraced such outstanding Americans as George W. Wickersham, former Attorney General of the United States; Newton D. Baker, former Secretary of War; Judge William S. Kenyon, former United States Senator; and Ada L. Comstock, president of Radcliffe College.

My personal friend, Major LAGUARDIA, who despite his wet views I consider one of the most valuable men in the House, can't by the wave of his hand brush aside the 4 conclusions signed by 10 out of 11 members of the Wickersham Commission, which constitute an unanswerable argument against repeal or return to beer.

The so-called tax expediency of raising revenue is foolish. At most it would be a mere drop in the bucket. Conditions in the liquor countries of Great Britain, France, Germany, and Mexico are far worse than our own. Revenue from liquor tax hasn't helped them. But if liquor taxes would produce a hundred billion dollars annually, it wouldn't balance the loss and ruin that follow in the wake of saloons.

It is said that prohibitionists are religious fanatics. I now quote from the world's greatest agnostic, Robert G. Ingersoll, who while saloons existed said:

"I believe that from the time alcohol issues from the coiled and poisonous worm in the distillery until it empties into the hell of death, dishonor, and crime it demoralizes everything that touches it from its source to its end.

"No one can contemplate the object without prejudice against the liquor crime. All we have to do is to think of the wrecks on either bank of the stream of death, of the suicides, of the insanity, of the poverty, of the ignorance, of the destitution, of the little children tugging at the faded and withered breasts of weeping and despairing mothers, of the wives asking for bread, of the men of genius it has wrecked, and man struggling with imaginary serpents. I believe every thoughtful man is prejudiced against this damned stuff that is called alcohol.

"It cuts down youth in its vigor, manhood in its strength, and age in its weakness. It breaks the father's heart, bereaves the doting mother, extinguishes natural affections, erases conjugal love, blots out filial attachments, blights parental hope, and brings down mourning age in sorrow to the grave. Alcohol produces weakness, not strength; sickness, not health; death, not life. It makes wives widows, children orphans, fathers fiends, and all of them paupers and beggars. It feeds rheumatism, nurses gout, invites cholera, imparts pestilence, and embraces consumption.

"Alcohol covers the land with idleness, misery, and crime. It fills our jails, almshouses, and asylums. It engenders controversy, fosters quarrel, and cherishes riots. It crowds our penitentiaries and furnishes victims for the scaffold. It is the lifeblood of the gambler, the element of the burglar, the prop of the highwayman, and the support of the midnight incendiary.

"It countenances the liar, respects the thief, esteems the blasphemer. It violates obligations, reverences fraud, and honors infamy. It defames benevolence, hates love, scorns virtue, slanders innocence.

"Alcohol incites the father to butcher his helpless offspring, helps the husband to massacre his wife, and the children to grind the parricidal ax. It burns up man, consumes women, detests life, curses God, and despises heaven. It suborns witnesses, nurses perjury, defiles the jury box, and stains the judicial ermine. It degrades the citizen, debases the legislature, dishonors the statesman, and disarms the patriot.

"Alcohol brings shame, not honor; terror, not safety; despair, not hope; misery, not happiness—and with the malevolence of a fiend it calmly surveys its frightful desolation and, unsatisfied with havoc, it poisons felicity, kills peace, ruins morals, blights confidence, slays reputations, and wipes out national honor—then curses the world and laughs at its ruin.

"Alcohol does all that and more—it murders the soul. It is the sum of all villainies, the father of all crimes, the mother of abominations, the devil's best friend, and God's worst enemy."

Ingersoll thus indicted this poisonous serpent, yet the Linthisum-Beck bill seeks to resuscitate it, restore its poisonous fangs, and legalize this deadly enemy to civilization. It must not be.

Wets shed crocodile tears over the army of bootleggers who have been arrested and punished. I want them to visualize the horde of millions of men, women, and little helpless children whom alcohol has cursed, ruined, and damned eternally.

In Wednesday's press Henry H. Curran, president of the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment, which daily stacks our desks with wet propaganda, announced that his organization would support wets and defeat drys. The Crusaders likewise threatened.

May I ask, Just what are the drys in the United States going to do about it? Our heartstrings have been wrung with the mother's appeal of Anne Lindbergh for her boy to be given only what she wants him to have. What her boy is to her, just that much is every other American boy to his mother. They have the inherent right to demand that alcohol by law shall not be given their sons. Whither are we drifting? Isn't it about time that fathers and mothers should awake? Isn't it about time for them to again put on their armor? The enemy is again before us. Let the bugle sound. Heads up! Eyes front!

This repeal measure must be defeated March 14. It can be defeated if fathers and mothers everywhere will ask their Congressman to vote against it and assure them of their gratitude. I have been ridiculed, harassed, and threatened for making a dry fight. If it causes political defeat, I accept my medicine. With respect to candidate or party, I happen to remember: For what does it profiteth if you gain the whole world and lose your soul?

SPEECH OF HON. FIORELLO H. LA GUARDIA, OF NEW YORK

You have just heard the Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON, who is a sincere dry and the outstanding champion of the cause in the House of Representatives. He is always forceful, but always fair.

Prohibition, after 12 years' trial, does not present a question of liquor but one of law and order.

The only way to know whether or not the majority of the American people are for or against prohibition is to give them an opportunity to express themselves on the issue. The only way to give the American people this opportunity is to provide for a constitutional amendment. Congress has before it in the House of Representatives a resolution on the question of prohibition to be submitted to the several States. The so-called Beck-Linthicum resolution will come before the House on March 14. The first vote will be whether or not the House will consider the resolution. That requires a majority vote. If the House decides in the affirmative, the next vote will be on the resolution, which will require a two-thirds vote. It would then go to the Senate. If it is passed there by a two-thirds vote, it is submitted to the several States for ratification by State conventions. That means that each State would elect delegates to a State convention on that issue and that issue alone. If the conventions of three-fourths of the States ratify this resolution, it would then become a part of the Constitution. This is the only way that our Constitution can be amended.

The resolution does three things: (1) Repeals the eighteenth amendment; (2) places the regulation of the traffic of liquor under the jurisdiction of the Federal Government; and (3) permits each State to decide for itself; fully protects States that desire to be dry. In fact, States sincerely desiring to be dry will have a great deal more protection under the system proposed in this constitutional amendment than they have to-day, or had even before prohibition. The sponsors seeking a repeal of prohibition have no desire to force liquor on any State that desires to be dry. This is quite in contrast to existing conditions where a few small States are forcing the continuance of prohibition on a great many of the larger States. It is too late now to argue the theoretical benefits of prohibition. That was quite proper before nation-wide prohibition was tried. At that time the hope was expressed that national prohibition would bring about nation-wide sobriety and ban forever the use of liquor. We have had 12 years' experience with national prohibition. There can be no honest difference of opinion as to existing facts.

The universal disregard of the law, the hundreds of thousands of speak-easies, the thousands and thousands of illicit stills, the enormous traffic in liquor, its presence in the homes, at parties, in the offices, in clubs, on the links, at conventions, and everywhere where men and women gather is so prominent and open as to make further comment unnecessary. The thousands of cases of violations of the law and the thousands of cases of convictions, of which the drys boast, are not indicative of the success of the law, but of its failure. Of course, all laws are violated; that is nothing new. In 1930, according to the boast of the Prohibition Department, 63,177 arrests were made by the Federal officials for violation of the law and no less than 30,108 persons received jail sentences, averaging 224 days each, or a total of 14,151,648 days in jail, or 38,771 years of imprisonment in addition to 36,341 persons being fined, with total fines of $5,606,326.

Now, assuming that the department's record is so high as to have arrested 1 in every 20 violators of the liquor law—and the average, of course, is nearer one in a thousand—even on this ridiculously low assumed average it indicates that over 1,263,000 people were actively engaged in violating the prohibition laws. These persons are in business and violating the law because of the demand for the liquor they sell. That being so, as small a list of customers as anyone desires to choose for each person so engaged will indicate that the market for liquor is enormous, in quantity as well as in number of customers. If prohibition had been a success in the 12 years it has been tried out, there would be no demand for liquor. If there were no demand for liquor there would not be the thousands and thousands of cases of violation of the law.

Prohibition has artificially created a crime that can not possibly be committed, in so far as the sale of liquor goes, unless for every ounce sold there is some one on the other end of the bar or on the receiving end of the bottle. The amount of liquor consumed in the United States requires an organized industry of the largest magnitude. Its turnover runs into hundreds of millions of dollars. Let us not conceal actual conditions and real facts in considering this problem. This enormous traffic could not possibly be carried on without the knowledge, if not the connivance, of public officials—Federal, State, county, and local. Such a condition is demoralizing to good government. This enormous industry is now in the hands and under control of a criminal element. Some are natural criminals, others are criminals so made by the law. Every country trying prohibition has had the same experience. This proves that customs and the appetites and morals of people can not be legislated. Every country that has tried prohibition has repealed it except the United States.

Before prohibition the traffic in liquor was under Government control. It is now under the control of the machine gun. The Federal Government is spending over $70,000,000 annually in an attempted enforcement, including the Prohibition Unit, the Industrial Alcohol Bureau, the Coast Guard, the border patrol, courts, and penal institutions, and is seemingly helpless and ineffective.

I leave it to every listener and fair-minded person whether the millions we are spending and the hundreds of millions of dollars spent since the enactment of prohibition have brought about even a semblance of enforcement. At the same time over $500,000,000 of taxes which should go into the Treasury of the United States are now going into the pockets of the racketeers. The United States Government has a deficit, while the racketeers are operated with a surplus. The United States Government has the law and the bootleggers have the liquor monopoly. Every effort has been made by the sponsors of prohibition to force this law on the people of the United States. Its enforcement has been tried under four different bureaus. In addition to creating a naval police, with cruisers and cannons, such as has never been seen in the history of the world, all that has been accomplished is increased cost to the taxpayers and several international complications.

We are confronted with a condition and not with a theory. It is no longer a question whether prohibition might be good, because we have had the opportunity of observing it for 12 years. We know it has been a complete failure. We have learned that it is not a question of temperance, because prohibition has not been conducive to temperance. The best test of the success of prohibition is to take the children who were from 8 to 15 years of age 12 years ago, when prohibition went into effect, and who to-day are from 20 to 27 years old. If prohibition had been a success this group of our citizenry would have no desire, no taste for liquor, and if that were so there could be no argument against prohibition. It is this very group of our citizenry between the ages of 21 and 27, who have grown up with prohibition, that know all about it and are strong for its repeal.

There can be no honest criticism or even opposition to the program of the so-called wets to resubmit to the American people the reconsideration of the eighteenth amendment. All that we ask is to have the people express themselves in each State as to whether or not they desire to continue under prohibition as now enforced, or whether or not they believe that liquor should be taxed and that it should be under Government control. If the people of any State desire to be dry, they would have a constitutional right to so provide. The difference under our proposed amendment to the Constitution and the existing eighteenth amendment is simply this: That the Constitution will be so amended that no American citizen will be compelled to take a drink against his will and the Constitution will be obeyed and respected. Under the existing eighteenth amendment all American citizens are prohibited from taking a drink, regardless of their desire, and most of them disregard or ignore the Constitution. If it was proper to submit this question to the American people before we knew how nation-wide prohibition would work out, I submit that, in all fairness, it is proper that we submit this question now, after 12 years, when we know what prohibition means.

CLOSING SPEECH OF CONGRESSMAN BLANTON

The radio audience has just listened to the smartest "wet" in the United States. In spite of his wet views, I deem my friend Major LAGUARDIA one of the smartest men in the United States Congress.

In one breath he tells us that the law is unenforceable and in the next breath he asserts that in 1930 Federal officials arrested over 63,000 violators, of whom over 30,000 received jail sentences averaging over 224 days each, and that over 36,000 other persons were fined total fines of $5,600,000. His admissions prove that the law is being enforced, even though it is not enforced so well as we might wish.

Just how are Major LAGUARDIA, a Republican leader, and other Republicans, going to get around the mandate of their party when they vote for repeal on March 14. Their Republican platform after citing George Washington and Abraham Lincoln about the sacred obligation to obey and enforce the Federal Constitution, referred to the eighteenth amendment, and said:

"The Republican Party pledges itself and its nominees to the observance and vigorous enforcement of this provision of the Constitution."

Both Major LAGUARDIA and Mr. BECK are "nominees" of the said Republican Party, and are bound by its mandate, until it has another convention and writes a different platform.

And just so Mr. LINTHICUM and I are bound, for in the 1928 convention at Houston, after properly rebuking the Republican Party for failing properly to enforce the eighteenth amendment, the Democratic Party placed in its platform this plank:

"Speaking for the national democracy, this convention pledges the party and its nominees to an honest enforcement of the eighteenth amendment and all other provisions of the Federal Constitution and all laws enacted pursuant thereto."

As we, BECK and LINTHICUM, LAGUARDIA and BLANTON, have thus bound ourselves by party pledges, just so shall we remain bound. I thank you.

FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to submit my request to speak at this hour, and I find myself without some of the papers and some of the figures and information which I had expected to use in connection with what I desire to say. I shall ask that I be not required to follow strict rules in correcting my remarks, so that I may include some figures that I may not attempt to use off-hand.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will my colleague also request that he be not interrupted until he can make his main speech?

Mr. STEAGALL. I will add that I hope Members will not interrupt me until I can cover the main points that I wish to discuss, but I shall be glad to yield before I conclude.

A great deal is being said with reference to hoarding and to the hiding of currency due to the difficulties that have come upon the banking system of the country. I have on my desk a bill which I expect to introduce this afternoon and which it was my purpose to have introduced before discussing it. I offer it for consideration and for the criticism of Members of the House who are interested.

The figures disclose that of the thousands of bank failures from which the country has suffered in recent years, and especially during the past two years, something like four-fifths of the failures have occurred among small banks.

We find ourselves in the distress that results from the closing of thousands of banks, and we are in a situation, as far as the national banking system is concerned, where people are no longer willing to invest their money in the capital of banks. Nobody wants to risk money in the capital stock of national banks, one important reason being that an investor in such capital is always afraid of the double liability resting upon stockholders. Worse than that, we are advised upon the highest authority that $2,000,000,000 are now idle and in hiding, because the citizens of the country are afraid to trust their money on deposit in banks.

This situation is one of profound concern to the people of the Nation and to all who are charged with official governmental responsibility. I do not believe we shall witness a revival and recovery of business so long as this condition continues. We passed the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill to afford temporary relief. We passed the recent bill liberalizing Federal reserve bank credit to meet the temporary emergency. Both will help; but we shall fail in our duty unless we find and furnish an adequate remedy along permanent lines.

The breaking down of our smaller banks did not just happen. It has been brought about as the result of conditions, in part, which nobody could have foreseen or did foresee, but also in part by the unwise, unnecessary, and unjustified strangling processes that have been turned on through the operation of law and through the administration of the Federal reserve system and the larger banks of the country. [Applause.]

I want to review very briefly some of the difficulties under which the smaller banks have labored during recent years. Prior to the passage of the Federal reserve law banks which carried their balances with their city correspondent banks were permitted to collect an interest return on those deposits. Under the Federal reserve law balances carried with the Federal reserve banks do not pay any return to their member banks. Prior to the passage of the Federal reserve law, banks—and I am speaking now mainly from the standpoint of the smaller banks of the country—were permitted to charge for the service rendered by them in remitting checks drawn upon time. The Federal reserve banks attempted to take away that right from all member banks. The better thought and the better legal judgment upon the proposition was that the Federal reserve banks were without authority to exact that service at the hands of their member banks without remuneration. The banks in many instances declined to render the service without pay.

It happened in some cases that the Federal reserve banks would accumulate a large number of checks and send them out by express, and in some instances that were called to the attention of the Banking and Currency Committee of the House they were sent out by two men with Winchesters, in automobiles, and laid on the windows of small banks and the cash demanded of them at one time.

While that controversy was on we had a bill that was sent over to the Senate from the House. The bill was sent to conference. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN], who is here now, offered a resolution in the House to instruct the conferees to agree to an amendment of the Senate, which provided that nothing in the Federal reserve law should be construed to authorize the Federal reserve banks to practice that hardship upon their member banks—the requirement that member banks should render the service of remitting checks without charge. The House adopted a conference report which, and as it turned out as later interpreted, nullified the instructions the House had given its conferees.

So we found ourselves in a situation where the Federal reserve banks had specific authority to require that service at the hands of the small banks of the country without compensation. These banks had been realizing substantial sums for this service.

The small-bank officials will tell you, if you will ask them, that they were enabled very often out of the charges for remitting checks to meet the overhead operating expenses of their banks. Prior to the Federal reserve law banks that are now members were accustomed to collect interest on deposits or balances kept with correspondent banks. Federal reserve banks pay member banks nothing on such deposits.

I might go along for some time before I should be able to review fully the difficulties of the smaller banks that have grown out of the exactions and requirements that have proven destructive.

Let me hasten, however, to refer to the measure which I am introducing to-day. The bill provides that no national bank shall be chartered with a capital of less than $50,000 and a surplus amounting to 10 per cent of the capital. That is intended to cure what has been regarded by many well-informed persons as an unsound provision of the national banking law, and which has resulted in the organization of too many banks not properly equipped in point of capital to justify taking over the deposits of a community, often many times the amount of the capital of the banks. Under the bill stockholders would be relieved of the double liability now imposed upon them. Of course, this would only apply to banks hereafter organized.

The bill further provides that member banks of the Federal reserve system shall be permitted to make a reasonable charge, not exceeding one-tenth of 1 per cent, for the service rendered by them in remitting checks.

The bill provides that half of the earnings of the Federal reserve system accruing after paying the 6 per cent return on the capital of their member banks and setting aside the 10 per cent required under the law for creating a surplus fund shall be returned to the member banks on the basis of their capital stock. [Applause.]

This legislation is now favored by many of the Federal reserve bank officials and by many men in the banking world who have heretofore been against its passage.

I have introduced such a bill for 10 years or longer session after session, and I call your attention to the fact that the directors of the Boston Federal Reserve Bank at their last meeting prior to the death of Governor Harding indorsed that bill. I think it will now be welcomed on every hand.

I wish to discuss now what I regard as the most important feature of the bill, and that is the provision which is designed to afford a guaranty system for deposits in banks that are members of the Federal reserve system. [Applause.]

In that connection I will say that session after session for 10 years I have introduced a bill requiring the Federal Reserve Board, under their own rules and regulations, to set aside and use the earnings of the Federal reserve system for the accumulation of a fund out of which to pay depositors in member banks that become insolvent.

Let me say in that connection that the original Federal reserve law, as it passed the Senate, embraced a provision for setting aside a portion of the earnings of the Federal reserve banks for the purpose of guaranteeing deposits in member banks. That provision went out of the bill in conference, and it went out upon one argument, and one argument alone. The argument was that the Federal reserve system was not to become a money-making institution, and would not accumulate sufficient earnings to carry the burden imposed by a requirement for guaranteeing deposits in member banks.

I do not criticize anybody who held the view that it was not wise to have the Federal reserve banks undertake this service at the outset, but it turns out that the opponents of this provision were mistaken in their contention and in their views of the matter. The records show that the Federal reserve banks have made net profits of more than one-half billion dollars since the system was inaugurated. To be exact, the figures show these profits to be $526,176,231 down to 1931. They have paid into the Federal Treasury $167,000,000 as a franchise tax, which they did not owe.

The provision for paying a franchise tax was simply put in as an automatic piece of machinery by which to take over any profits that might be accumulated above the dividends to be paid and the surplus fund provided for in the law. After paying the franchise tax they have now something like $275,000,000 of surplus.

This enormous net profit has been made by these banks above expenditures on buildings and in personnel and in various activities with which the House is familiar and which have been the subject of discussion and criticism in Congress from time to time since the passage of the Federal reserve law.

Let me say this: The Federal reserve system of banks has made in one year, repeatedly, more than $50,000,000 of net earnings.

Now, could they have carried the burden imposed by the Senate amendment requiring that the system take care of deposits in insolvent banks? Could they? Let us see. The records show that from the time of the enactment of the national banking law down to the year 1925, a period of over 60 years, the total net losses of depositors in national banks were about $45,000,000. Something like three-quarters of a million dollars annually would have paid the losses to depositors in member banks for the first 60 years of the operation of the national banking law of this country.

The figures show that the total losses to depositors in national banks and in all member banks from the foundation of the national system down to 1930 amount to only $82,000,000.

Since 1930 we have had an unprecedented wave of bank failures. It is not possible that the net losses to depositors in banks that are members of the Federal reserve system could amount to more than 25 or 50 per cent of the total deposits. This is putting it in its worst possible light. Calculated over a period of years the losses of depositors is not enormous. They are surprisingly trivial.

Mr. HARLAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question at that point?

Mr. STEAGALL. Let me proceed a little further, and then I shall be pleased to yield.

The bill which I have prepared provides for the creation of a board to consist of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller of the Currency and three members to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, who shall take over the liquidation of banks that are declared insolvent.

The board is authorized to use the fund of $167,000,000 that has been paid into the Treasury of the United States in the form of a franchise tax by the Federal reserve banks.

And I may say in this connection that this money, in good conscience, in common honesty, belongs now to the banks, out of which it was made. That is where that fund properly belongs. [Applause.]

The bill provides for the use of this fund of $167,000,000, and it provides for taking over by the board of the $150,000,000 of the surplus now in the hands of the 12 Federal reserve banks. In addition to this, provision is made for an assessment of an additional $200,000,000 upon the deposits of member banks, pro rating it so that time deposits pay their proportion in accordance with the amount of such deposits as related to demand deposits.

Under this provision the board would have $517,000,000 with which to begin its operations, and, strictly speaking, fairly interpreted, not one dollar of that fund comes out of the Treasury of the United States. All of it is money made by the Federal reserve system and some of it out of banks that have found themselves unable to carry on under adverse conditions because of scant earnings.

The bill does not provide for a fund in excess of the amount that has been earned down to this hour by the Federal reserve banks out of their member banks. So that under the bill the banks are carrying their own burden, discharging their own obligations, and discharging an obligation that common honesty suggests they ought to discharge. This money was made out of member banks and the assets of member banks rest upon their deposits. That is where the banks get their money.

Now, the bill provides that when a bank becomes insolvent and is certified by the Comptroller of the Currency to the board as an insolvent institution the board takes it over for liquidation. Of course, the board would avail itself of the experience and good judgment of the comptroller and his force of trained officials.

First, the board would appoint one man, the stockholders would appoint one man, the depositors would appoint another, as a committee to examine the assets of the bank, determine their value, and to estimate the possible loss of the depositors of the bank. The board would be allowed 30 days for this appraisal, and then 60 days from the time the bank is closed the board would make a payment to the depositors. Under the provisions of the bill, the first payment would be not less than 50 per cent of all individual deposits that do not exceed $1,000. On all other deposits they would pay only 25 per cent, except where 25 per cent amounts to less than $500, and in that case they would pay depositors the amount of $500.

Six months later the board is required to pay not less than an additional amount of 25 per cent to general depositors, and the remaining 50 per cent due depositors whose individual deposits do not exceed $1,000. Six months later the board is required to pay an additional 25 per cent to all depositors. After the expiration of an additional six months the board would pay all depositors in full and take over whatever assets that might remain. Such assets would be disposed of for the benefit of the guaranty fund.

Now, the record shows that this fund would be sufficient.

It is inconceivable that it would not be sufficient to pay off the depositors of any ordinary bank that might be placed in liquidation.

But somebody says, "Oh, you will have a big bank failure, and you will not be able to take care of it." First, 60 days is allowed before the board pays anything. During that time, if necessary, the board can sell off some of the liquid assets, and collect some of their bills. Banks always have some cash on hand, so at the end of 60 days they have available cash and liquid assets to meet the initial installment. At the end of 6 months—which gives 8 months from the time a bank closes—the board is required to pay a second installment, and so again the board may wait 6 months to pay the third installment and again 6 months to pay the fourth installment; so if the board finds it advisable they may wait 20 months to make the final payment to depositors.

Now, somebody says that this bank guaranty will not work, that it has been tried in several States and it failed. Let me say that the man who makes that argument has never given much thought to the subject. That is the answer I desire to make to that argument because nobody can seriously contend that the failure of a few State banks in one State, depending on the vicissitudes of business in one State with a few small State banks with limited resources to carry on a successful guaranty system, bears any proper relation to the ability of the great Federal reserve system of this country to render such a service——

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alabama may have 10 minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. STEAGALL. The fact is that the guaranty plan in the States that tried it has not fallen down so completely as many have been made to believe; those efforts have not proven so unfortunate as we have been told.

There are more people in the United States interested in this legislation to-day than some of us realize. Do not think that the people do not know what is the matter with our banking system. They understand that citizens have reached the point where they are afraid to risk deposits in banks. Take the men in this House who are interested. I see my good friend, Mr. MCCLINTIC of Oklahoma, a Member long interested, and other able Members. Those most interested in this subject and most favorable to legislation of this kind are from States that have tried guaranty plans. They are the strongest advocates of a guaranty system to be found in this House. Several of these gentlemen have introduced bills on the subject.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes; in a moment. The failure of some of these States to maintain a successful system does not answer the question of whether the great Federal reserve system of this country with its vast resources can do it, when the records show that they can, and when in all fairness and common honesty they ought to be made to do it. They should be required to do it, because they made these enormous profits out of their member banks, and the assets of member banks rest upon deposits of the citizenship of the communities where these banks are located. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS].

Mr. HASTINGS. I have introduced a bill that goes to the root of this evil and that will correct it. The bill requires every bank to guarantee its own individual deposits. That will restore confidence, and I challenge the attention of the Banking and Currency Committee and the Members of this House to that plan. We guarantee now city funds and State funds and school funds and all other kinds of public funds. Why not make each bank stand on its bottom and guarantee deposits up to a certain amount? In my bill I put it at 25 per cent of the individual deposits. That will reach the evil and will restore confidence and bring the money out of hiding.

Mr. STEAGALL. The gentleman has made a suggestion the purpose of which I heartily approve. I will say, however, that, in my judgment, the individual banks of the country can not carry the burden. It is not possible. Many of them have found it difficult already to remain open and keep in a state that will enable them to respond to the demands of their depositors. If you require the small individual bank now struggling against adverse conditions which exist to-day to guarantee its own deposits, you will find many of them unable to afford the guaranty, and when they can not, and others do, banks that could not give the guaranty would find themselves in such a situation that they would soon lose the confidence of the depositing public completely and have to close their doors.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. When the word goes out this afternoon that the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee of the House of Representatives has announced that he has introduced a bill and that the committee will consider its provisions to guarantee depositors of banks, it will do more to stop hoarding than all of the appeals made to-day by officials, directly and indirectly, can possibly do. [Applause.]

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I understand the gentleman's bill has just been introduced.

Mr. STEAGALL. I am introducing the bill to-day.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Does the guaranty of deposits go so far as to guarantee deposits in small State banks?

Mr. STEAGALL. Oh, no.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Well, will not this kind of a bill destroy some of the small State banks? Will not it put them out of business if their deposits are not guaranteed?

Mr. STEAGALL. No.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I would like to have the gentleman think about that.

Mr. STEAGALL. I shall be glad to answer the gentleman's question, and if he is solicitous for a system that will embrace State banks I will join hands with him if he will get the support for it that he should be able to get to enable us to enact it into law. But we can make progress only by degrees, and we have not jurisdiction over State banks. All we can do is first to set up a common-sense system for the National banks and State banks that are members of the Federal reserve system, and when we do it, it will be only a question of time before State banks will find themselves in a situation where business prudence and common-sense management demand that they put themselves on a basis of equality with their competitors in the Federal reserve system. They will be thronging the Federal reserve system of this country asking for admission, and the law provides that all shall be admitted whose admission would make it advantageous to the Federal reserve system to have them as members.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I agree; but in the meantime I do not want to see the State banks fail.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I came in just as the gentleman was addressing the House.

Mr. STEAGALL. I knew of the gentleman's deep interest in this matter and of his thorough understanding of the problem. I appreciate his efforts in that connection. When I came into the House to-day I asked permission to address the House on this subject to-morrow. The suggestion was made that there was other business of an urgent nature on the calendar to-morrow and that I should make my request as of to-day in order to get time. That is the only reason I did not notify the gentleman and many others here who are interested in this subject, so that they could all be here when I began.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I have a bill before the gentleman's committee, as has the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], and we are asking for a hearing. I am, of course, glad to have the gentleman take this matter up. I delivered a speech on the subject. From all over the country, from almost every State in the Union, I have had letters in response to that speech from bankers, showing their intense interest in this matter.

I congratulate the House and I congratulate the committee, and I shall support the bill.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Can the gentleman assure the House that hearings will be held on his bill in the very near future?

Mr. STEAGALL. It is my purpose and intention to make the suggestion to the Committee on Banking and Currency that at the earliest day possible we shall begin consideration of the bill.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alabama be allowed to proceed for five additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Ther was no objection.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. I am in hearty accord. I do not believe we can pass any other measure that will more quickly restore confidence of depositors in banks. I had this in mind when I introduced such a bill many, many years ago, and it was said to be the first bill ever introduced relating to this subject.

Mr. STEAGALL. In my judgment—and I have given a great deal of thought to this subject, and I have heard it discussed often by many men of splendid ability, both for and against—it is idle to talk to the people of this country about putting their money in banks in the present state of fear entertained by the public. Any banker who goes to another banker to obtain funds, even for 30 days, with a specific purpose in mind and a specific date on which it is to be returned, is confronted with a demand that he put up two or three or four or five times the amount he desires to borrow in securities before the banker will trust his fellow banker for 15 days or 90 days with the funds of that bank. I read in the paper this morning where a member of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Board addressed the people of the country and urged them to trust the banks, to put their money in the banks so that the money might get into useful activities and into pursuits that will tend to revive business and to restore normal conditions in commerce and industry; but that very gentleman to-day—and I am not criticizing him, for that is his duty—when an application for an emergency loan comes before that board will be demanding collateral security from three to five times the amount loaned that is sound and adequate before he will loan one dollar to the bank.

Yet we talk to the citizenship of the country about placing their money into banks in order to prevent hoarding. The truth of the matter is the banks are doing the hoarding. I do not censure them. The officials should remember their obligations to their depositors. They are in a situation where they should not be blamed. It is all that is left for them to do. They dare not turn their money and liquid assets into business activities at a time like this. Let citizens know that when they place their earnings in banks that are supervised by the Government; in banks that bear on their doors the words "national bank," "member of the Federal reserve system," "Government depository"—banks above which floats the flag of the United States; that they will be able to get them back upon demand; that they may trust the deposit slip of such an institution as they would a Government bond. When we do that we will stop hoarding, and when we stop hoarding we shall have started on the road that leads to a revival and recovery of business in this country. [Applause.]
